The repertory will include at least three works from the French wing, "Manon," "Faust" and "Carmen"; the Prokofieff satire, "The Love for Three Oranges"; the Wagnerian high comedy and the two Mozart works, "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro," representing the German wing; and, from the Italian wing, "La Boheme," "Madame Butterfly," "Aida," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacci" and "La Traviata." "The Love for Three Oranges" and "The Marriage of Figaro" will be sung in English, as usual.

Announce Soloists

Twenty-eight instrumental soloists are announced by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony for its 1951-52 season. Seven will be heard with the orchestra for the first time, including the Greek pianist, Gina Bachauer, who made a highly successful New York recital debut this season.

The list of instrumental soloists follows:

Pianists: Gina Bachauer, Jean Casadeus, Robert Casadeus, Aldo Ciccolini, Clifford Curzon, Rudolf Firkusny, Frank Glazer, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Grant Johannesen, Constance Keene, Oscar Levant, William Masselos, Hortense Monath, Guiomar Novaes, Rudolf Serkin, Arthur Schnabel and the duo pianists—Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe.

Violinists: Zino Francescatti, Jascha Heifetz, Frances Magnes, Nathan Milstein, Erica Morini, Michael Rabin and Isaac Stern.

Violoncellists: Gregor Piatigorsky and Leonard Rose.

The curriculum includes coaching in vocal and instrumental repertoire, theory, composition, conducting and program-making and is under the direction of Max Helfman.

Music Scholarships

In connection with Jewish Music Month, Dewey D. Stone, president of the Brandeis Youth Foundation, has announced the granting of $10,000 in music scholarships.

The art institute is a development of the Brandeis camp institutes sponsored some ten years ago by the late Justice Louis D. Brandeis, and under the guidance of Dr. Shlomo Bardin for the training of Jewish youth for leadership in Jewish cultural life in America.

Molenda Recital Tomorrow; Westminster Organ Dedication

By THEODOLINDA C. BORIS

ALTHOUGH the new organ in the Holmes Chapel of Westminster Church will be formally launched in the Fall with a special series of programs, it will be dedicated by a recital by Hans Vigeland, organist of the church, Wednesday evening at 8:15.

The recital had been scheduled early in the hope that the donor, George C. Rice, who died two weeks ago, might be present. The instrument will be known as the George C. and Ida K. Rice Memorial Organ. It has over 1400 pipes and a detached positiv division on the back wall of the chapel. The Donald S. Scheu Memorial Chimes will be a part of the new organ.

Designed in the classic tradition, it was built, according to specifications drawn up by G. Donald Harrison and Joseph S. Whiteford, by the Aeolian-Skinner Organ Company of Boston. This company also built the Great Organ in the Mormon Tabernacle in Salt Lake City, the new organ in Boston's Symphony Hall and the organs at Harvard University.

Mr. Vigeland's program will be as follows:

Chaconne .... Louis Couperin (1626-1661)

Festivals Far and Wide For Musical Vacationists

WHETHER music-lovers go east or west, north or south for their vacations this year, they're bound to find themselves not too far away from a variety of summer music festivals.

Best-known, of course, is the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., which opens July 7 with Serge Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony in six Bach-Handel-Mozart concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall, and in nine major symphonic concerts in the Music Shed beginning July 26. A special production of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," in which Dr. Koussevitzky made his American debut as opera conductor, is scheduled for July 30, 31 and Aug. 1.

Sharing the conducting assignments, will be Charles Munch, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, and Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian conductor.

The Central City (Col.) Opera Festival opens June 30. Tibor Kozma of the Metropolitan Opera will be musical director and Elmer Nagy general director.

The Plymouth Rock Festival begins June 29 and plans for a nine-week season, the longest in its six-year history. It has scheduled four operas for the Duxbury Theater in Duxbury, Mass., also the 17th Century masque, "The Fairy Queen," by Henry Purcell, and a full production of Haydn's "Creation."

At Stow, Mass., the Trapp Family will be hosts as usual to all comers between July 9 and Aug. 30. The Trapps have been conducting their "Sing Weeks" for the past eight years.

Turning westward again, we find the Aspen Festival, Aspen, Col., assuming such major proportions that already it is being called the Tanglewood of the West. From July 2 to Aug. 26, the program lists an enticing schedule of music events, lectures and forums. The Albeneri Trio, Paganini Quartet, Darius and Madeleine Milhaud, Reginald Kell, clarinetist, Martial Singher, baritone, and many other greats in music are to make up the music faculty.

Southward one notes the Cumberland Forest Festival, June 25-Aug. 25, at Sewanee, Tenn., under the direction of Dr. Roy Harris. The reputation of this festival has so interested the Voice of America that it plans to rebroadcast overseas many of the scheduled concerts.

Russell Gerhart to Direct St. Louis Philharmonic

RUSSELL GERHART, conductor for 22 years of the Altoona Civic Symphony Orchestra, has been appointed conductor of the St. Louis Philharmonic Orchestra. This semiprofessional orchestra, numbering about 90 players, both professional and amateur, will be entering its 92d season this Fall.

Mr. Gerhart has been guest conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra and is well-known to Buffalonians as a violin teacher at Chautauqua during the Summer. Born in Altoona, he has studied under some of the leading violin instructors of this country, including Mischa Mischakoff, concertmaster of the NBC Symphony and the Chautauqua Symphony. He attended the Berkshire Summer School at Tanglewood in 1942. He also has been regular conductor of the Hagerstown Symphony, the Bedford Symphony and the Johnstown Symphony Orchestra.

Buffalo Cello Student Going to Tanglewood

ELLEN ARRIGO, a cello student of William Fahlbusch at the Community Music School of Buffalo, has been awarded a scholarship at the Berkshire Music Center for the six-week session beginning July 2. She was accepted for work in orchestra and chamber music. Miss Arrigo, 21, studied for three years with Allison MacKown at the Eastman School of Music and has been a student at the Community Music School for two years. She has played with the Amherst Symphony Orchestra for several years, and plans to make music her life-work.

Michigan YMCA to Give Program on Tuesday

THE Michigan Ave. YMCA will present its fourth annual musical extravaganza on Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Technical High School Auditorium. Those to be heard include Wilton Lawrence, bass-baritone; Henry Edmonds, pianist, both students from the Eastman School of Music; the Royal Serenaders, a 15-voice male glee club, and the Rhythmettes, a high school girls' sextette.

Koussevitzky, Munch to Share Conductorship At Tanglewood; Season's Programs Announced

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Music Director, will be at Tanglewood this summer for the first time and share with Serge Koussevitzky the concerts in the Music Shed in the Berkshire Festival of 1951. Dr. Koussevitzky, continuing as Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's Summer school at Tanglewood, will open the Festival with three weekends of concerts by an orchestra of chamber proportions on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons July 7-8, 14-15, 21-22; devoting the programs to the music of Bach and Mozart, and this year, Haydn as well.

During the three weeks that follow there will be nine concerts in the Shed by the full Orchestra on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 26. Charles Munch will conduct the concerts of the first week. He will divide the concerts of the second week with Serge Koussevitzky. In the last week, Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct a concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct two concerts, closing the Festival on Sunday afternoon, August 12.

One of the major productions of the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of which Dr. Koussevitzky is the Director, will be Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame." Boris Goldovsky, who was on leave of absence from the Opera Department last summer, will return and will prepare and direct the production.

"Pique Dame" ("The Queen of Spades") is based on the dramatic short story of Pushkin. At the first performance on Monday, July 30, which is in the second week of the Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct opera for the first time in America.

The entire program will be as follows:

Mr. Munch will conduct Series A:

Thursday Evening, July 26: Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva;" Schumann Fourth Symphony; Berlioz Fantastic Symphony

Saturday Evening, July 28: Piano Concerto (Soloist: Claudio Arrau) Prokofieff, Sixth Symphony

Sunday Afternoon, July 29: Barber, Overture to "The School for Scandal;" Copland, "Quiet City;" Mennin, Fifth Symphony; Franck Symphony in D minor

Koussevitzky and Munch To Conduct at Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky and Charles Munch will divide honors this season in conducting the concerts of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Koussevitzky, director of the Berkshire Music Center and retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will preside over 12 concerts, the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series in the Theater Concert Hall the first three weekends of the festival, July 7 through 22, and the closing Shed concerts, Aug. 9 through 12. He also will conduct the performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" by the opera department.

Munch will make his debut at Tanglewood as conductor of the concerts in the Shed for the first two weeks, July 26 through Aug. 4. He is at present on an extensive European guest-conducting tour and will return to America after appearing in his native Strasbourg June 25.

Koussevitzky recently returned to his home in Lenox, Mass., after conducting in western cities and vacationing in Phoenix, Ariz.

Another prominent conductor on the Tanglewood schedule is the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho, who will direct the concert of Aug. 5.

CONCERTS TO be directed by Munch include those on the nights of July 26, July 28 and the afternoon of July 29, the night of Aug. 2 and the afternoon of Aug. 5. Among composers represented: Schumann, Prokofieff with Claudio Arrau, pianist; Aaron Copland, Cesar Franck, Berlioz, Mennin, Haydn, Ravel, Debussy, Roussel, Handel, Bela Bartok, Saint-Saens. De Carvalho will conduct works by Guarnieri, Prokofieff, with Jorge Bolet, pianist as soloist, and Moussorgsky-Ravel.

SERIES C, comprising works by Beethoven, Tschaikowsky, Honneger and Brahms, will be conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, Aug. 9, Aug. 11, Aug. 12; the first program: the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis," soloists to be announced. In addition to music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart in the Theater Concert Hall weekends July 7-8, 15-16, 22-23, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct performances there on July 30-31 and Aug. 1. Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame" as prepared by the Berkshire Music Center Opera Department under Boris Goldovsky.

During this month, when our musical interest begins to shift towards Summer programs, we are reminded that Serge Koussevitzky has not wholly severed the ties which bound him to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for so many years. As in past years, the eminent conductor will be back at Tanglewood this year to conduct 12 concerts in the Berkshire Music Festival.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who has been resting in Phoenix, Arizona, after the completion of his American tour with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, is returning to his home in Lenox, Mass., to prepare for the coming Festival programs. He is also in charge of the activities of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school which is in session during the Festivals.

The present conductor of the Boston Orchestra, Charles Munch, will make his Tanglewood debut at the coming Festival. Mr. Munch returned to his native France at the end of the current Boston season to fulfill a series of engagements abroad. Last Monday he conducted the Radio Diffusion, his former orchestra in Paris, giving the first European performance of Honegger's Fifth Symphony in this concert. This is the work which was so unfavorably received here in the final concert of the Boston Orchestra in Woolsey Hall this season. Incidentally, the Symphony was composed for Serge Koussevitzky, and he will conduct it during one of the coming Festival programs. Mr. Munch will conduct the first two weeks of the Shed concerts, July 6-August 4. He is scheduled to conduct in his native Strasbourg on June 25 so that he will arrive back in this country just in time for his Festival debut.

While Dr. Koussevitzky obviously relishes his continuing connection with the Boston Orchestra through the Berkshire Music Festival programs, his first love is the school which he founded there a decade ago. The successful growth of the Berkshire Music Center to the point where it now attracts students from both here and abroad has probably given him more satisfaction than the success of the concerts themselves.

This year, he will head the faculty, as usual, with Aaron Copland as assistant director. Luigi Dallapiccola, eminent Italian composer, will come to this country for the first time to join Mr. Copland in the composition department. In the department of instrumental music and conducting, Dr. Koussevitzky will have as assistants Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Lukas Foss, Seymour Lipkin and Howard Shanet. Leonard Bernstein, for several years a member of the conducting faculty will be away on a leave of absence. Hugh Ross will again be in charge of the choral activities, assisted by Alfred Nash Patterson. The Festival Chorus will perform Beethoven's Missa Solemnis under the direction of Dr Koussevitzky in the main shed concerts. The Small Choir will perform several Bach choral works and a Mozart Mass in the Bach-Mozart series. The principal players of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give instruction in orchestral playing and in chamber music in the division of which Gregor Piatigorsky is head and William Kroll associate head Other teachers in this department are Jean Bedetti, Ralph Berkowitz Lukas Foss, Fernand Gillet and Ruth Posselt.

Berkshire Music Festival To Include Boston's Munich

NEW YORK (U.P.)—Plans have been announced for the 1951 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's new music director, will be at Tanglewood this summer for the first time and will share with Serge Koussevitzky, retired leader of the Bostonians, in conducting the concerts in the Tanglewood music shed.

Koussevitzky, continuing as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, will open the festival with three weekends of concerts by an orchestra of chamber proportions on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 7-8, 14-15, 21-22, devoting the programs to the music of Bach, Mozart and Haydn.

During the three weeks that follow there will be nine concerts in the shed by the full orchestra on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 26. The festival will close on August 12.

The New York City Opera Company will open its spring season at the City Center on March 14 with Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," the successful new production of last fall and the first Wagnerian opera essayed by the organization since the 1945 production of "The Flying Dutchman." The season will close on April 22.

New to the repertory will be Massenet's "Manon," second of the operatic works based on the Abbe Prevost novel to be offered at City Center. The company previously revived the Puccini "Manon Lescaut," with Dorothy Kirsten in the title role, in the first New York production in approximately 20 years.

The repertory will include at least three works from the French wing, "Manon," "Faust" and "Carmen";the Prokofieff satire, "The Love for Three Oranges"; the Wagnerian high comedy and the two Mozart works, "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro," representing the German wing; and, from the Italian wing, "La Boheme," "Madame Butterfly," "Aida," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacci" and "La Traviata." "The Love for Three Oranges" and "The Marriage of Figaro" will be sung in English, as usual.

Twenty-eight instrumental soloists are announced by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony for its 1951-52 season. Seven will be heard with the orchestra for the first time, including the Greek pianist Gina Bachauer who made a highly successful New York recital debut this season.

The list of instrumental soloists follows:

Pianists: Gina Bachauer, Jean Casadesus, Robert Casadesus, Aldo Ciccolini, Clifford Curzon, Rudolf Firkusny, Frank Glazer, Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Grant Johannesen, Constance Keene, Oscar Levant, William Masselos, Hortense Monath, Guiomar Novaes, Rudolf Serkin, Artur Schnabel and the duo pianists Arthur Whittemore and Jack Lowe.

Violinists: Zino Francescatti, Jascha Heifetz, Frances Magnes, Nathan Milstein, Erica Morini, Michael Rabin and Isaac Stern.

Violincellists: Gregor Piatigorsky and Leonard Rose.

The curriculum includes coaching in vocal and instrumental repertoire, theory, composition conducting and program-making and is under the direction of M... Helfman.

Music Festival Opens July 7 at Tanglewood

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass. — The Mohawk Trail at Greenfield leads the traveler into the Berkshire country, with its verdant hills and leisurely rivers. Friendly and welcoming inns intrigue the stranger passing through sleepy towns. Picnic grounds and camping facilities abound.

Amid such scenes lies Tanglewood, where the annual music festival has achieved universal significance. This year's festival is scheduled for July 7 to August 12, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play. This drowsy little spot nestling between Lenox and Stockbridge will be the mecca for leading figures of the musical world and for music lovers the world over.

Berkshire Music Festival To Include Boston's Munich

NEW YORK. (U.P)—Plans have been announced for the 1951 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch, the Boston Symphony's new music director, will be at Tanglewood this summer for the first time and will share with Serge Koussevitzky, retired leader of the Bostonians, in conducting the concerts in the Tanglewood music shed.

Koussevitzky, continuing as director of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, will open the festival with three weekends of concerts by an orchestra of chamber proportions on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, July 7-8, 14-15, 21-22, devoting the programs to the music of Bach, Mozart and Haydn.

During the three weeks that follow there will be nine concerts in the shed by the full orchestra on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 26. The festival will close on August 12.

The New York City Opera Company will open its spring season at the City Center on March 14 with Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," the successful new production of last fall and the first Wagnerian opera essayed by the organization since the 1945 production of "The Flying Dutchman." The season will close on April 22.

New to the repertory will be Massenet's "Manon," second of the operatic works based on the Abbe Prevost novel to be offered at City Center. The company previously revived the Puccini "Manon Lescaut," with Dorothy Kirsten in the title role, in the first New York production in approximately 20 years.

The repertory will include at least three works from the French wing, "Manon," "Faust" and "Carmen";the Prokofieff satire, "The Love for Three Oranges"; the Wagnerian high comedy and the two Mozart works, "Don Giovanni" and "The Marriage of Figaro," representing the German wing; and, from the Italian wing, "La Boheme," "Madame Butterfly," "Aida," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacci", and "La Traviata." "The Love for Three Oranges" and "The Marriage of Figaro" will be sung in English, as usual.

Twenty-eight instrumental soloists are announced by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony for its 1951-52 season. Seven will be heard with the orchestra for the first time, including the Greek pianist Gina Bachauer who made a highly successfu New York recital debut this season.

The list of instrumental soloist follows:

Pianists: Gina Bachauer, Jea Casadesus, Robert Casadesu Aldo Ciccolini, Clifford Curzo Rudolf Firkusny, Frank Glaze Nicole Henriot, Myra Hess, Gra Johannesen, Constance Keen Oscar Levant, William Massel Hortense Monath, Guiomar N vaes, Rudolf Serkin, Artu Schnabel and the duo pianists Arthur Whittemore and Ja Lowe.

Violinists: Zino Francesca Jascha Heifetz, Frances Magn Nathan Milstein, Erica Mori Michael Rabin and Isaac Stern.

Violincellists: Gregor Piatigorsky and Leonard Rose.

The curriculum includes coaching in vocal and instrumental repertoire, theory, composition conducting and program-making and is under the direction of M... Helfman.

Music Festival Opens July 7 at Tanglewood

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass. — The Mohawk Trail at Greenfield leads the traveler into the Berkshire country, with its verdant hills and leisurely rivers. Friendly and welcoming inns intrigue the stranger passing through sleepy towns. Picnic grounds and camping facilities abound.

Amid such scenes lies Tanglewood, where the annual music festival has achieved universal significance. This year's festival is scheduled for July 7 to August 12, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play. This drowsy little spot nestling between Lenox and Stockbridge will be the mecca for leading figures of the musical world and for music lovers the world over.

Berkshire Festival At Tanglewood Begins July 7

Serge Koussevitzky, who is returning to his home in Lenox, Mass., after conducting in West and resting in Phoenix, Ariz., will conduct twelve concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood this summer.

Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will return from Europe to make his Tanglewood debut, conducting the concerts of the first two weeks in the Shed July 26-Aug. 4.

Eleazar de Carvalho, the Brazilian conductor, will return to conduct the concert of August 5. Dr. Koussevitzky, besides directing the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's school at Tanglewood, and conducting Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" by the opera department, will open the Festival with the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series in the Theatre-Concert Hall July 7-22, and close the Shed concerts, Aug. 9-12.

Mr. Munch returned to his native France on the completion of the Boston Symphony's winter season. He conducted the Radio Diffusion, his former orchestra in Paris, May 7, when he gave the first European performance of Honegger's Fifth Symphony. Mr. Koussevitzky, for whom the symphony was composed, will conduct it at the Berkshire Festival, Aug. 11. Mr. Munch will conduct Berlioz' Requiem in the Cathedral at Bordeaux, May 26. He will conduct the Italian Radio Orchestra in Turin and return to Paris to lead the Lamoureux concerts on June 15 and 19. After conducting in his native Strasbourg on June 25, he will leave for Tanglewood.

The Bach-Mozart-Haydn series by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players will take place on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons in the first three weekends of the Festival, July 7-22. The Shed concerts will be on the following three weekends (Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons) closing Aug. 12. The series subscriptions are now being taken in Symphony Hall, Boston. Beginning June 1, remaining tickets will be sold singly for each concert.

Announce Plans For Berkshire Festival

The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have announced the plans for the Berkshire Festival of 1951 at Tanglewood, in Lenox, Mass. Charles Munch, the Orchestra's Music Director, will be at Tanglewood this summer for the first time and share with Serge Koussevitzky the concerts in the Music Shed. Dr. Koussevitzky, continuing as Director of the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer school at Tanglewood, will open the Festival with three weekends of concerts by an orchestra of chamber proportions on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoon July 7-8, 14-15, 21-22; devoting the programs to the music of Bach and Mozart, and this year, Haydn as well.

During the three weeks that follow there will be nine concerts in the Shed by the full orchestra on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 26. Mr. Munch will conduct the concerts of the first week. He will divide the concerts of the second week with Dr. Koussevitzky. In the last week, Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct a concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct two concerts, closing the Festival on Sunday afternoon, August 12.

Serge Koussevitzky, who retired as the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the spring of 1949, is now touring this country with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. Charles Munch is in his second season as the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor. He will conduct concerts in Italy and France at the conclusion of the present season which ends in April, and return to this country to make his Tanglewood debut in July.

Renewals and orders are now being received for series tickets for each week of the Shed concerts. Series ticket holders for these concerts have the first choice of places for the earlier Bach-Mozart-Haydn series. The programs and soloists will be announced shortly. Inquiries about the Festival and the school be addressed to George E. Judd, Manager, Symphony Hall, Boston 15.

The ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will have a six weeks session from July 2 to August 12. The departments of the school, with a faculty of forty, include conducting, orchestra, chamber music, chorus, opera, composition and a new provision for musical educators.

Tanglewood Festival Highlights Season

Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Pittsfield, Mass.

Whatever the season, one of the basic vacation charms of the Berkshire Hills in Massachusetts is the ever-changing picture painted by nature. From earliest budding of leaves in the spring, throughout the summer, the glorious pageantry of autumn foliage and winter snows, there is an unspoiled quality to the region to delight every visitor.

Yet hand in hand with these endless natural beauties are facilities for every type of active and quiet recreation or just plain relaxation.

The outdoor pleasures are complemented by the greatest variety of fine hotels, inns, camps, ranches, guest homes, roadside cabins, and other resorts that cater to every social requirement and budget limitation.

One may be active or lazy, as whim dictates. There are opportunities galore for swimming, sailing, fishing, riding, golfing, tennis, hiking, and many other participative sports, as well as those of the spectator variety.

Series of Concerts

There is an abundance for those whose interests are cultural. Foremost is the Berkshire Festival under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky which will be held July 2-Aug. 12. In addition to the Music Center activities there will be a series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood with works of the great masters, most of which are held on week ends. There are, however, many lesser instrumental, choral, and operatic performances throughout the season as part of the daily school of music.

Unusual Motor Trips

For the nature lover there are almost endless delights. Among the places to be visited are Pleasant Valley Bird and Wild Flower Sanctuary, Lenox; Bartholomew's Cobble, Ashley Falls; Greylock Memorial atop Mt. Greylock, highest peak in the state; and any or all of the 16 State Forests and Reservations. Berkshire Garden Center, Stockbridge, opens for the season with a May Day Festival and continues throughout the season, closing with its widely known Harvest Festival in October.

Many unusual scenic motor trips may also be taken, such as the Mohawk Trail—North Adams to Greenfield; Taconic Trail—Pittsfield to Troy, New York; Berkshire Trail — Pittsfield to Northampton; Skyline Trail, east from Hinsdale; Knox Trail, east from Great Barrington.

There are more than a dozen sporty golf courses scattered throughout the Berkshires, well divided between 9- and 18-hole size. One or more will be within easy driving distance wherever the visitor is staying and guest privileges are extended by all the clubs.

The 16 State Forests and Reservations offer a wide range of recreation in addition to scenic splendor. Camping facilities are provided on some, picnic areas on all, and scores of miles of hiking and horseback riding trails, as well as auto roads. Swimming is permitted in most of the State Forest ponds, and some are stocked annually with fish.

Many Natural Beauties

Many natural beauties are part of the forests, such as Tannery Falls in Savoy Mountain State Forest; Tipping Rock, just outside Sandisfield State Forest in New Marlborough; Schermerhorn Gorge Cascades in October Mountain State Forest; Campbell Falls in Great Barrington, and Bash Bish Falls in the forest by the same name tucked away in the southwest corner.

While these will appeal to all nature lovers, there is also Pleasant Valley Wild Flower and Bird Sanctuary, where are found not only most of our native flora and fauna, but also rare specimens seldom seen but carefully nurtured here. A natural history museum is located in connection with the sanctuary; there are guides and picnic areas for visitors.

The excellent network of primary and secondary highways throughout the area will take the motorist to every section of the region and open a kaleidoscopic change of vista and pageantry that will long remain a delightful memory.

Berkshire Center Arranges Busy Season Kansas Turns Spotlight on Piano Tuning

By Alice Eversman

Another busy season has been arranged for the Berkshire Music Center both as regards the student activities and the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The latter will be divided into the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series, on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons from July 7 to 22 inclusive, directed by Serge Koussevitzky, and the Berkshire Festival programs from July 26 to August 12 on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. The nine programs will have the first five directed by Charles Munch, the sixth by Eleazar de Carvalho, and the final three by Koussevitzky.

Programs to be conducted by Mr. Munch are made up of numbers he has played at the various concerts of the winter season including those given here. The only unfamiliar compositions listed are Mennin's "Symphony No. 5," on July 29; Roussel's "Symphony No. 3," on August 2, and Saint-Saens' "Symphony No. 3" for organ, on August 4. Mr. de Carvalho's program on August 5 begins with Guarnieri's "Symphony No. 2" and has Jorge Bolet as soloist in Prokofieff's second piano concerto. Series C, which Koussevitzky conducts, starts off with Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," on August 9, and for the following concert he has programmed Honegger's "Symphony No. 5," premiered in March, with Sibelius' of the same number, and Tschaikowsky's sixth. The final event will be devoted to Brahms, his second and third symphonies coupled with the "Variations on a Theme by Haydn."

A special feature of the music school program will be the performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame" on July 30 and 31 at which time Koussevitzky will make his American debut as an opera conductor. The festival chorus will sing the "Missa Solemnis," and Bach choral works and Mozart's mass will be given by the Small Choir. Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer, whose opera, "The Prisoner," was given for the first time in this country March 15 by the Juilliard Opera Theater, will serve with Aaron Copland in the composition department. An innovation in the school plan this summer will be a course for music teachers under Augustus D. Zanzig, director of music in the public schools of Brookline, Mass., and lecturer on music education at Harvard. It is called Music for Music Educators.

BERKSHIRE FETE LISTS 3 CONCERT PROGRAMS

Concerts during the first three weeks of the Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, Mass., will be devoted to the music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart, respectively. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct members of the Boston Symphony in the Theatre-Concert Hall on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons beginning July 7.

Lukas Foss, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz will be soloists in Bach's two concertos for three pianos on the first week-end, which also will see performances of the First Brandenburg Concerto and vocal music.

The Haydn programs of the next week-end will feature Symphonies 88, 92, 99, 101, 102; the Piano Concerto in D major, with Seymour Lipkin as soloist, and the 'Cello Concerto in D major with Gregor Piatigorsky.

Mr. Foss will play Mozart's Piano Concerto in E flat the third week-end, which will feature also Symphonies 36 and 39, the Serenade for Winds, Divertimento for two horns and strings and the Missa Brevis.

The full orchestra will be heard on the next three Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons in the Music Shed. Charles Munch will lead the majority of concerts, with Dr. Koussevitzky and Eleazar de Carvalho sharing the remainder.

Tanglewood Lends Skirts to Skirtless

Music Festival Frowns on Shorts and Slacks

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3 (AP).—Tanglewood officials "prefer" that ladies wear skirts when they visit the scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's famous summer concerts. But more and more of them have been showing up recently in shorts or slacks.

Today ushers offered informally-clad tourists wrap-around skirts for wear on the grounds.

Thomas B. Perry jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, said the wrap-arounds would "give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform—a skirt."

So far there are just eight wrap-arounds for visitors wearing shorts or slacks. They come in two sizes—large or medium.

Koussevitsky To Conduct At Tanglewood

Serge Koussevitzky, who is returning to his home in Lenox after conducting in our Western cities and resting in Phoenix, Ariz., will conduct 12 concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood this summer. Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will return from Europe to make his Tanglewood debut, conducting the concerts of the first two weeks in the Shed July 26-Aug. 4.

Eleazar de Carvalho, the Brazilian conductor, will return to conduct the concert of Aug. 5. Dr. Koussevitzky, besides directing the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's school at Tanglewood, and conducting Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" by the Opera Department, will open the festival with the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series in the Theater-Concert Hall July 7-22, and close the Shed concerts, Aug. 9-12.

Charles Munch returned to his native France on the completion of the Boston Symphony's winter season. He conducted the Radio Diffusion, his former orchestra, in Paris, May 7, when he gave the first European performance of Honegger's Fifth Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky, for whom the Symphony was composed, will conduct it at the Berkshire Festival Aug. 11. Mr. Munch will conduct Berlioz' Requiem in the Cathedral at Bordeaux on May 26. He will conduct the Italian Radio Orchestra in Turin and return to Paris to lead the Lamoureux concerts on June 15 and 19. After conducting in his native Strasbourg on June 25, he will leave for Tanglewood.

The Bach-Mozart-Haydn series by a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony players will take place on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons in the first three week ends of the festival, July 7-22. The Shed concerts will be on the following three week ends (Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons) closing Aug. 12. The series subscriptions are now being taken in Symphony Hall, Boston. Beginning June 1, remaining tickets will be sold singly for each concert.

Big Season Foreseen for Music Festivals

NEW YORK, May 25 (UP)—It's going to be a big summer music-wise, with "festivals" dotting the country and special summer concerts in the cities.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Mass., the best known of the yearly off-season events, will open July 7 with Serge Koussevitzky, its founder, conducting the Boston Symphony. A special production of Tchaikowsky's opera, "Pique Dame," is scheduled.

This year Charles Munch, his successor as regular conductor of the Boston orchestra, will share the conductorial assignment for the first time. Eleazar de Carvolho, the Brazilian musician, will be a guest conductor.

The Central City, Colo., Opera Festival begins June 30 in that mountain town 40 miles from Denver. Tibor Kozma, of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the musical director again this year and Elemer Nagy will be the general director.

The Plymouth Rock festival will begin June 29 and is planned for nine weeks, which will be the longest season of its six-year history. It has scheduled four operas for the Duxbury theatre in Duxbury, Mass., and the 17th century basque, "The Fairy Queen", by Henry Purcell. A unique double-bill will be of Kurt Well's "Down in the Valley" and the Gilbert and Sullivan opera, "Trial By Jury."

Tanglewood Plans No Summer Changes

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston — The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., will not be modified this summer despite the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told The Times.

"Dr. Koussevitzky's condition was no secret to us here in Boston," Mr. Judd said, "and although his death came as a great blow to all of us, it was not unanticipated."

The Berkshire Music School will continue all its plans as originally formulated, he said, with most of the directorial chores falling to Assistant Director Aaron Copland.

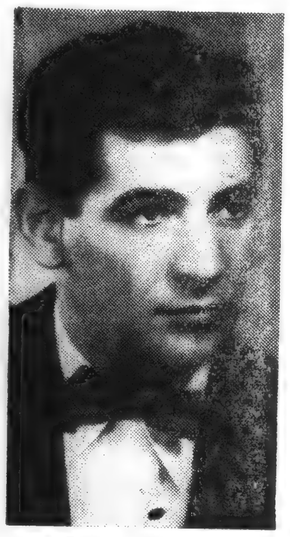
BSO Director Curtails European Engagements—Young Conductor Succeeds Dr. Koussevitzky at Berkshire Music Center



Leonard Bernstein

Charles Munch

BOSTON—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning July 1 to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Adds Concert Appearances

Mr. Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theatre concert hall. In addition to the two weeks of Music Shed concerts already announced, he will also conduct the final week of concerts.

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the BSO for 25 years until his retirement in 1949, and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood since 1940, died last week in Brookline. He was scheduled to conduct three week ends of concerts at this year's Festival, including the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series.

Mr. Munch will be making his first Tanglewood appearance this summer. Original plans called for him to conduct only the opening concerts of the full orchestra in the Music Shed.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert Aug. 5 as planned. Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," already scheduled for Thursday evening, Aug. 9.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Mr. Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has canceled his plans to live in Mexico and is returning to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Goldovsky, Copland Returning

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchiakovsky's "Pique Dame." The school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos." There is no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments. Aaron Copland, who has been this winter in the American Academy at Rome, will return in time for the school's opening exercises on Sunday, July 1.

Mr. Munch, who has been conducting concerts in Paris and elsewhere, will close his European season in Strasbourg June 25 and will return to America to arrive in Lenox for the opening Bach concerts. Mr. Munch has informed the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that there will be a minimum of changes in the program originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. The BSO management will announce full program details soon.

MUNCH EXCELS AT TANGLEWOOD MAJOR CONCERT

Opening of Series Shows Rare Talent of Noted French Conductor

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, July 26—There was an air of expectancy among the music lovers who thronged the music shed and the grounds at Tanglewood tonight. This was the opening of the three series of concerts which will be given in the shed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch. The excitement was engendered, we believe, by the fact that many of these people were meeting Mr. Munch for the first time.

Familiar to Many

Others who had heard him conduct the works of Bach-Haydn and Mozart during the past weeks knew that this unassuming French conductor had captivated his audiences by his personal charm, his gentile, yet decisive manner of conducting and by his willingness to let music speak for itself. But, how would he handle the larger works which make up the repertoire of the shed concerts?

The answer came quickly. With the closing notes of the noble music which Mozart wrote following the death of two friends who were free masons one was able to relax, secure in the knowledge that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was under the musical direction of a rarely sensitive musician, a conductor with the feeling and knowledge to interpret the great orchestral works in a manner to hold the interest and bring out all the beauties and colors of the scores.

The Mozart "Masonic funeral music" was written during July, 1785, after Mozart lost two dear friends. This is noble music, never melancholy, rather music which reaches towards the heights, for to Mozart "death is the true end of our life."

Symphonic Poem

Schumann's "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor" is the most integrated of all this symphonies. It may well be called a symphonic poem, a form which is based upon the irrefutable assertion that there is no break between two successive emotional states. Schumann first thought of this symphony in terms of a symphonic texture. There is seldom any recapitulation, always there is new thematic material to hold the listener.

Mr. Munch conducted the work with great devotion. He can summon mighty fortes when he wishes. But it was in the unveiling of the subtle nuances that he was at his most persuasive. The Romanza was revealed through incomparable beauty of tone and there was just the right lilt and brilliance to the finale.

Amerikanische Musikfeste im Sommer 1951

Es ist eine Unmöglichkeit, eine Liste aller Musikfeste und musikalischer Sommerkurse aufzustellen, die während der nächsten Monate in USA stattfinden. Es seien deshalb nur einige Veranstaltungen grossen Stils genannt, die mehr als lokale Bedeutung besitzen.

An der Spitze steht wieder Tanglewood mit Konzertzyklen, Opernaufführungen, Kammermusikveranstaltungen und den pädagogischen Kursen des "Berkshire Music Center", so schwere Schatten auch auf alle Aktivitäten durch den Tod Serge Koussevitzkys gefallen sind. Die bereits feststehenden Programme werden durch eine stärkere Heranziehung von Charles Munch und Leonard Bernstein in ihren Umrissen aufrechterhalten, und die traditionell Bach und Mozart, diesmal auch Haydn gewidmeten Vorkonzerte, ebenso die Opernaufführungen der "Pique Dame" von Tschaikowsky werden keine Aenderungen erfahren. Was die Opernschule unter Boris Goldowsky präsentiert, wird aus weiteren Ankündigungen ersichtlich sein. Während das "Music Center" seine Arbeit am 2. Juli aufnimmt, beginnen die klassischen Vorkonzerte im Theatersaal am Samstag, 7. Juli; die Hauptzyklen, die Charles Munch, Eleazar de Carvalho und Leonard Bernstein leiten, werden am Donnerstag, 26. Juli, mit Charles Munch in dem grossen "Shed" eröffnet.

Seit wenigen Jahren stellt Aspen in Colorado unter der musikalischen Gesamtleitung von Joseph Rosenstock dem Unternehmen in Tanglewood eine Einrichtung zur Seite, die sich vornehmlich auf Kammermusik und Orchesterwerke in kleiner Besetzung konzentriert. In acht Wochen werden 24 Konzerte, ausserdem viele Vorträge, Kurse und Einzelstunden, in den verschiedensten Disziplinen geboten. Ein Blick auf die Programme der Konzerte, für die, ähnlich wie früher in den Berkshires, ein mächtiges Zelt errichtet ist, zeigt, dass neben Werken der klassischen und romantischen Literatur zeitgenössische Produktion stark vertreten ist. Als Lehrkräfte wurden zahlreiche bekannte Namen, u. a. Darius Milhaud, dessen Frau, Erich Itor Kahn, Karin Branzell, Leslie Chabay, Rudolf Firkusny, Herta Glaz, Mark Harrell, Reginald Kell, Marcel Singher und Rosina Tolenberg gewonnen.

Zu den künstlerisch bedeutenden Musikfesten des Sommers darf man auch das zum 14. Mal stattfindende "Bach Festival" in Carmel, Calif., zählen. Unter der Leitung von Gastone Usigli werden vom 16.-22. Juli sechs Konzerte gegeben, deren Höhepunkt die Aufführung der "Johannes-Passion" bildet. Von den Solisten seien Alice Ehlers (Cembalo), Ruth Slenczinski (Klavier) und Ludwig Altman (Orgel) hervorgehoben.

Bemerkenswert erscheint auch die Serie von sechs Konzerten, die Daniel Saidenberg auf dem Fairfield University Field in Fairfield, Conn., veranstaltet. In ihnen werden bekannte Solisten wie Alec Templeton, Ann Ayars Hugh Thompson, Virginia MacWatters und Conrad Thibault erscheinen.

364 Students Enrolled at Music Center

Four From County Will Study At Tanglewood

Four Berkshire County musicians have enrolled for the ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. With 360 others, who represent 33 states and 11 countries, they will study for six weeks, beginning July 1 "on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance." The preliminary registration of the school, held in connection with the annual Berkshire Festival which Charles Munch, music director of the Boston orchestra will open July 7, exceeds by more than 100 that of this time last year, with 10 more days before the closing of the list.

The local students are Robert M. Coleman, now of New York City, son of Mrs. Donald L. Coleman of 44 Thomson Place and the late Mr. Coleman, Joseph Pizzonia of 8 Lyric Street, Pittsfield; Frederick W. Lord of 75 Lewis Street, Great Barrington, and Miss Clarissa Cardillo of North Adams. Mr. Coleman, who holds a A. B. degree from the Juilliard School of Music, New York City, is a graduate of Pittsfield High School. He has been on tour for three months with the Robert Shaw Chorale orchestra as first viola. A former student of Miss Kathleen Parlow and Conrad Held of the South Mountain Quartet and former Mary E. Jones, director of the Pittsfield Community Music School, he has played with the Mozart Chamber Orchestra, and the Stokowski "All-Star" Orchestra.

Mr. Pizzonia, a basoon player, studied at the New England Conservatory of Music after graduating from Pittsfield High School. He has played with the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, Providence, the Albany Orchestra and the Central Florida Symphony Orchestra in Tampa. This season will be his fourth at Tanglewood.

Mr. Lord is a graduate of Searles High School and Dartmouth College. He has sung as tenor soloist with the Dartmouth glee club and with the Handel Society Chorus, the Dartmouth Madrigal Singers and the White Church choir.

Miss Cardillo, an opera student, is a sister of Pasquale A. Cardillo, clarinetist with the Boston orchestra. She is a graduate of Drury High School, attended the North Adams State Teachers College for one semester, and has a bachelor of music degree from the New England Conservatory.

WORLD OF MUSIC: BERKSHIRE PLANS

Fate of Music Center, After This Summer, Rests With Trustees Of Boston Symphony—Festival Will Continue

By ROSS PARMENTER

THOSE knowing how much the Berkshire Music Center depended on the personal enthusiasm of Serge Koussevitzky are speculating on what will become of the famous summer school now that the conductor is dead. This year the future is known. The school will continue under the momentum established by its founder. No one will be given the title of director, but the administrative responsibility will be divided between Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland.

The school, which was established in 1940, has no separate governing body of its own. Its trustees are the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its fate has been decided annually by those trustees, for the school's continuance comes up each year. George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, said there was no policy to discontinue the center. It is known, though, that its maintenance costs the orchestra substantial amounts of money.

Whatever the fate of the school, there is no question about the continuance of the profitable Berkshire Festival. The Boston Symphony's summer concerts at Tanglewood will go on. Charles Munch, who has remained out of the Tanglewood picture up to this time, was already scheduled to lead five of the concerts when Dr. Koussevitzky died. Now he will take over two of Dr. Kousevitzy's three concerts in the Shed and all six of the Theatre-Concert Hall programs in the preliminary Bach Haydn-Mozart series.

The one Koussevitzky concert that Mr. Munch will not conduct is the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9. That will be led as a memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky by Mr. Bernstein. The chorus will consist of students of the Berkshire Music Center.

The center's major opera, Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" on July 30 and 31 will be conducted by Boris Goldovsky. There is poignancy in the fact that it will not be led by Dr. Koussevitzky. The 76-year-old conductor had been looking forward to it. He was about to conquer a new field, for the performance would have marked his debut in this country as a conductor of opera.

CENTERS: The fruitful Tanglewood idea—that of providing instruction for talented young musicians in conjunction with a summer festival—has also gained a foothold in Europe. Charles Jones, American composer, reports that the annual double event founded at Byranston in England in 1948, will take place again this year. He will be one of the instructors together with Boris Blacher, Imogen Holst, Wilfred Mellers and Roger Désormière. The center's main operatic venture will be a revival of Mozart's "Zaide."

Another center will be conducted at Bad Ausee, which is near Salzburg. This one will be sponsored by the Austrian State Academy of Music and all of the ninety students participating will be given tuition free. The festival will include an operetta, "Wiener Blut" and the première of a new opera, "Das Perlenhemd" ("The Shirt of Pearls"), an oriental fairy tale by Justinus Kaufmann.

Music Founder To Be Honored Thursday

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 21—Music ranging from Mozart to Prokofieff and Copland will be heard by audiences this week who attend the Berkshire Music Festival programs in the Shed. Director for the week is Charles Munch.

Sunday afternoon's concert, which features members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will include Mozart's "Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns," "Violin Concerto in A Major," with William Kroll, and "Symphony No. 38," the "Prague" Symphony.

The late Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the festival, will be honored at a memorial program Thursday night, when Mozart's "Funeral Music" will be performed by the orchestra.

Other works on Thursday's program include Schumann's "Symphouy No. 4," and Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony."

Orchestra and piano will be featured Saturday night, when Webers Overture to "Oberon," Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 6," and Brahm's "Piano Concerto No. 2" are heard. Guest pianist will be Claudio Arrau.

The orchestra next Sunday will perform Barber's Overture from "The School for Scandal," Copland's "Quiet City," Schuberts "Symphony No. 4," and Franck's "Symphony in D Minor."

BSO Director Curtails European Engagements—Young Conductor Succeeds Dr. Koussevitzky at Berkshire Music Center

Leonard Bernstein

Charles Munch

BOSTON—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning July 1 to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood.

Adds Concert Appearances

Mr. Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theatre concert hall. In addition to the two weeks of Music Shed concerts already announced, he will also conduct the final week of concerts.

Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor of the BSO for 25 years until his retirement in 1949, and founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood since 1940, died last week in Brookline. He was scheduled to conduct three week ends of concerts at this year's Festival, including the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series.

Mr. Munch will be making his first Tanglewood appearance this summer. Original plans called for him to conduct only the opening concerts of the full orchestra in the Music Shed.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert Aug. 5 as planned. Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," already scheduled for Thursday evening, Aug. 9.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Mr. Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has canceled his plans to live in Mexico and is returning to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Goldovsky, Copland Returning

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchiakovsky's "Pique Dame." The school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos." There is no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments. Aaron Copland, who has been this winter in the American Academy at Rome, will return in time for the school's opening exercises on Sunday, July 1.

Mr. Munch, who has been conducting concerts in Paris and elsewhere, will close his European season in Strasbourg June 25 and will return to America to arrive in Lenox for the opening Bach concerts. Mr. Munch has informed the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that there will be a minimum of changes in the program originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. The BSO management will announce full program details soon.

MUNCH EXCELS AT TANGLEWOOD MAJOR CONCERT

Opening of Series Shows Rare Talent of Noted French Conductor

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, July 26—There was an air of expectancy among the music lovers who thronged the music shed and the grounds at Tanglewood tonight. This was the opening of the three series of concerts which will be given in the shed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch. The excitement was engendered, we believe, by the fact that many of these people were meeting Mr. Munch for the first time.

Familiar to Many

Others who had heard him conduct the works of Bach-Haydn and Mozart during the past weeks knew that this unassuming French conductor had captivated his audiences by his personal charm, his gentile, yet decisive manner of conducting and by his willingness to let music speak for itself. But, how would he handle the larger works which make up the repertoire of the shed concerts?

The answer came quickly. With the closing notes of the noble music which Mozart wrote following the death of two friends who were free masons one was able to relax, secure in the knowledge that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was under the musical direction of a rarely sensitive musician, a conductor with the feeling and knowledge to interpret the great orchestral works in a manner to hold the interest and bring out all the beauties and colors of the scores.

The Mozart "Masonic funeral music" was written during July, 1785, after Mozart lost two dear friends. This is noble music, never melancholy, rather music which reaches towards the heights, for to Mozart "death is the true end of our life."

Symphonic Poem

Schumann's "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor" is the most integrated of all his symphonies. It may well be called a symphonic poem, a form which is based upon the irrefutable assertion that there is no break between two successive emotional states. Schumann first thought of this symphony in terms of a symphonic texture. There is seldom any recapitulation, always there is new thematic material to hold the listener.

Mr. Munch conducted the work with great devotion. He can summon mighty fortes when he wishes. But it was in the unveiling of the subtle nuances that he was at his most persuasive. The Romanza was revealed through incomparable beauty of tone and there was just the right lilt and brilliance to the finale.

Amerikanische Musikfeste im Sommer 1951

Es ist eine Unmöglichkeit, eine Liste aller Musikfeste und musikalischer Sommerkurse aufzustellen, die während der nächsten Monate in USA stattfinden. Es seien deshalb nur einige Veranstaltungen grossen Stils genannt, die mehr als lokale Bedeutung besitzen.

An der Spitze steht wieder Tanglewood mit Konzertzyklen, Opernaufführungen, Kammermusikveranstaltungen und den pädagogischen Kursen des "Berkshire Music Center", so schwere Schatten auch auf alle Aktivitäten durch den Tod Serge Koussevitzkys gefallen sind. Die bereits feststehenden Programme werden durch eine stärkere Heranziehung von Charles Munch und Leonard Bernstein in ihren Umrissen aufrechterhalten, und die traditionell Bach und Mozart, diesmal auch Haydn gewidmeten Vorkonzerte, ebenso die Opernaufführungen der "Pique Dame" von Tschaikowsky werden keine Aenderungen erfahren. Was die Opernschule unter Boris Goldowsky präsentiert, wird aus weiteren Ankündigungen ersichtlich sein. Während das "Music Center" seine Arbeit am 2. Juli aufnimmt, beginnen die klassischen Vorkonzerte im Theatersaal am Samstag, 7. Juli; die Hauptzyklen, die Charles Munch, Eleazar de Carvalho und Leonard Bernstein leiten, werden am Donnerstag, 26. Juli, mit Charles Munch in dem grossen "Shed" eröffnet.

Seit wenigen Jahren stellt Aspen in Colorado unter der musikalischen Gesamtleitung von Joseph Rosenstock dem Unternehmen in Tanglewood eine Einrichtung zur Seite, die sich vornehmlich auf Kammermusik und Orchesterwerke in kleiner Besetzung konzentriert. In acht Wochen werden 24 Konzerte, ausserdem viele Vorträge, Kurse und Einzelstunden, in den verschiedensten Disziplinen geboten. Ein Blick auf die Programme der Konzerte, für die, ähnlich wie früher in den Berkshires, ein mächtiges Zelt errichtet ist, zeigt, dass neben Werken der klassischen und romantischen Literatur zeitgenössische Produktion stark vertreten ist. Als Lehrkräfte wurden zahlreiche bekannte Namen, u. a. Darius Milhaud, dessen Frau, Erich Itor Kahn, Karin Bronnell, Leslie Chabay, Rudolf Firkusny, Herta Glaz, Mark Herrell, Reginald Kell, Martial Singher und Roman Totenberg gewonnen.

Zu den künstlerisch bedeutenden Musikfesten des Sommers darf man auch das zum 14. Mal stattfindende "Bach Festival" in Carmel, Calif., zählen. Unter der Leitung von Gastone Usigli werden vom 16.-22. Juli sechs Konzerte gegeben, deren Höhepunkt die Aufführung der "Johannes-Passion" bildet. Von den Solisten seien Alice Ehlers (Cembalo), Ruth Slenczinski (Klavier) und Ludwig Altman (Orgel) hervorgehoben.

Bemerkenswert erscheint auch die Serie von sechs Konzerten, die Daniel Saidenberg auf dem Fairfield University Field in Fairfield, Conn., veranstaltet. In ihnen werden bekannte Solisten wie Alec Templeton, Ann Ayars, Hugh Thompson, Virginia MacWatters und Conrad Thibault erscheinen.

364 Students Enrolled at Music Center

Four From County Will Study At Tanglewood

Four Berkshire County musicians have enrolled for the ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. With 360 others, who represent 33 states and 11 countries, they will study for six weeks, beginning July 1 "on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance." The preliminary registration of the school, held in connection with the annual Berkshire Festival which Charles Munch, music director of the Boston orchestra will open July 7, exceeds by more than 100 that of this time last year, with 10 more days before the closing of the list.

The local students are Robert M. Coleman, now of New York City, son of Mrs. Donald L. Coleman of 44 Thomson Place and the late Mr. Coleman, Joseph Pizzonia of 8 Lyric Street, Pittsfield; Frederick W. Lord of 75 Lewis Street, Great Barrington, and Miss Clarissa Cardillo of North Adams. Mr. Coleman, who holds a A.B. degree from the Juilliard School of Music, New York City, is a graduate of Pittsfield High School. He has been on tour for three months with the Robert Shaw Chorale orchestra as first viola. A former student of Miss Kathleen Parlow and Conrad Held of the South Mountain Quartet and former Mary E. Jones, director of the Pittsfield Community Music School, he has played with the Mozart Chamber Orchestra, and the Stokowski "All-Star" Orchestra.

Mr. Pizzonia, a basoon player, studied at the New England Conservatory of Music after graduating from Pittsfield High School. He has played with the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, Providence, the Albany Orchestra and the Central Florida Symphony Orchestra in Tampa. This season will be his fourth at Tanglewood.

Mr. Lord is a graduate of Searles High School and Dartmouth College. He has sung as tenor soloist with the Dartmouth glee club and with the Handel Society Chorus, the Dartmouth Madrigal Singers and the White Church choir.

Miss Cardillo, an opera student, is a sister of Pasquale A. Cardillo, clarinetist with the Boston orchestra. She is a graduate of Drury High School, attended the North Adams State Teachers College for one semester, and has a bachelor of music degree from the New England Conservatory.

WORLD OF MUSIC: BERKSHIRE PLANS

Fate of Music Center, After This Summer, Rests With Trustees Of Boston Symphony—Festival Will Continue

By ROSS PARMENTER

THOSE knowing how much the Berkshire Music Center depended on the personal enthusiasm of Serge Koussevitzky are speculating on what will become of the famous summer school now that the conductor is dead. This year the future is known. The school will continue under the momentum established by its founder. No one will be given the title of director, but the administrative responsibility will be divided between Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland.

The school, which was established in 1940, has no separate governing body of its own. Its trustees are the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its fate has been decided annually by those trustees, for the school's continuance comes up each year. George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, said there was no policy to discontinue the center. It is known, though, that its maintenance costs the orchestra substantial amounts of money.

Whatever the fate of the school, there is no question about the continuance of the profitable Berkshire Festival. The Boston Symphony's summer concerts at Tanglewood will go on. Charles Munch, who has remained out of the Tanglewood picture up to this time, was already scheduled to lead five of the concerts when Dr. Koussevitzky died. Now he will take over two of Dr. Kousevitzy's three concerts in the Shed and all six of the Theatre-Concert Hall programs in the preliminary Bach Haydn-Mozart series.

The one Koussevitzky concert that Mr. Munch will not conduct is the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9. That will be led as a memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky by Mr. Bernstein. The chorus will consist of students of the Berkshire Music Center.

The center's major opera, Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" on July 30 and 31 will be conducted by Boris Goldovsky. There is poignancy in the fact that it will not be led by Dr. Koussevitzky. The 76-year-old conductor had been looking forward to it. He was about to conquer a new field, for the performance would have marked his debut in this country as a conductor of opera.

CENTERS: The fruitful Tanglewood idea—that of providing instruction for talented young musicians in conjunction with a summer festival—has also gained a foothold in Europe. Charles Jones, American composer, reports that the annual double event founded at Byranston in England in 1948, will take place again this year. He will be one of the instructors together with Boris Blacher, Imogen Holst, Wilfred Mellers and Roger Désormière. The center's main operatic venture will be a revival of Mozart's "Zaide."

Another center will be conducted at Bad Ausee, which is near Salzburg. This one will be sponsored by the Austrian State Academy of Music and all of the ninety students participating will be given tuition free. The festival will include an operetta "Wiener Blut" and the première of a new opera, "Das Perlenhemd" ("The Shirt of Pearls"), an oriental fairy tale by Justinus Kaufmann.

Koussevitzky To Direct 'Pique Dame'

BOSTON, April 14—The production of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" this summer at the Berkshire Music Center will mark Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's first appearance in this country as an operatic conductor.

The opera, to be performed July 30 and 31 in the Music Shed, will be staged by Boris Goldovsky.

ANOTHER innovation during this year's summer school and festival is the special course for music teachers, called "Music for Music Educators," which will be taught by Augustus D. Zanzia, lecturer on music education at Harvard University.

Students already are enrolling for the music center's summer school session which opens July 2 and closes Aug. 12.

Dr. Koussevitzky, head of the faculty, will direct the orchestra. Assistant director will be Aaron Copland, who also will instruct in the composition department. Copland will be assisted by Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer.

Other faculty members include such well known musical figures as Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Lukas Foss, Seymour Lipkin, and Howard Shanet, who will assist Dr. Koussevitzky in instrumental music and conducting.

HUGH ROSS, assisted by Alfred Nash Patterson, will be in charge of choral activities. The festival chorus will perform Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" during the series.

Principal players in the Boston Symphony Orchestra will instruct orchestral playing and in chamber music. Head of this division is Gregor Piatigorsky, who is being assisted by William Kroll.

Tchaikovsky Opera To Be Produced At Tanglewood Center

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," at Tanglewood next summer. This will be a major production of the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of which Dr. Koussevitzky is the Director. Boris Goldovsky, who was on leave of absence from the Opera Department last summer, will return and will prepare and direct the production.

"Pique Dame" ("The Queen of Spades") is based on the dramatic short story of Pushkin. At the first performance on Monday, July 30, which is in the second week of the Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct opera for the first time in America. The performance will be repeated. Tickets may be secured by members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a society of those who, by contributions, endorse the project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's school at Lenox, Mass.

The ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center will begin on July 2nd and continue through the Berkshire Festival to August 12.

Koussevitzky to Conduct His First Opera in U.S. In Tanglewood July 30-31

By E. V. W.

This date in music: Preparations complete for the opening, the next day, of the Yaddo Festival of Contemporary Music, in Saratoga Springs.

STUDENTS ARE ENROLLING for the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky director, July 2 to Aug. 12, in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

THE CENTER is a summer music school maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with Berkshire Festival concerts. A special feature of the 1951 session will be a production of Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame," July 30-31, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky's first appearance in America as a conductor of opera.

ALSO, THERE will be a course for music teachers called Music for Music Educators. This innovation in Music Center courses, will be supervised by Augustus D. Zanzig, director of music in Brookline, Mass. public schools and lecturer on music education in Harvard University. Dr. Koussevitzky heads the Music Center faculty with Aaron Copland assistant director. Luigi Dallapiccola, eminent Italian composer, will come to the States for the first time, to join Copland in the composition department.

IN THE department of instrumental music and conducting, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Lukas Foss, Seymour Lipkin and Howard Shanet will assist Dr. Koussevitzky. Leonard Bernstein, for some years a member of the conducting faculty, will be on leave of absence. Hugh Ross again will be in charge of choral activities. The Festival Chorus will perform Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" under Dr. Koussevitzky in the Berkshire Festival series.

IN CHAMBER MUSIC, Gregor Piatigorsky is chief instructor with William Kroll, associate. There will be 15 concerts during the Berkshire Festival, July 7 to Aug. 12, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, to visit Tanglewood for the first time, and Eleazar de Carvalho. The school will present about 40 performances during its six-week session —choral, opera, orchestral and chamber music concerts. Many of these programs will be in the Theater-Concert Hall. As usual the Boston Symphony concerts will be in the great Shed.

EUGENE ORMANDY, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will direct this program tomorrow night in Central High School: Suite for Strings, Opus 5 by Corelli; the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D Major; an Arioso by Louis Mennini, contemporary composer, whose works are increasing in favor and the Fire Bird Suite by Stravinsky. This will mark the final concert of the season by a visiting musical organization, of high repute. The Philadelphia is recognized among the "greats" of the world. Dave Salmon, Inc. is local manager.

Music News: Koussevitzky To Direct Summer Opera

By ARTHUR BERGER

The news that Tchaikovsky's "Queen of Spades" entered the Covent Garden repertory was received nostalgically in December by some operagoers here. But it now seems we need not envy the English public since this work will be the vehicle for the Berkshire Music Center's major opera production next summer at Tanglewood. Serge Koussevitzky, at its first performance, July 30, will appear in a role new for him in this country, that of opera conductor.

"The Queen of Spades" was first heard in America on March 5, 1910, at the Met, when it was curiously sung in German, one of the three European languages used there for Russian operas, until the saner custom of singing them in English was established as recently as last season, with Mussorgsky's "Khovanchina." Gustav Mahler conducted in 1910, and the cast included Destin, Slezak and Didur. A touring Russian group gave it in its original tongue with Nina Koshetz in 1932 at the New Amsterdam Theater, and other Russian troupes gave it at Mecca Temple (now the City Center) at intervals up to February, 1935. It was in the New Opera Company's repertory in English in 1941 and 1942. Known more familiarly as "Pique Dame," it is the second of the Tchaikovsky operas that have survived, the other being "Eugene Onegin," heard at the City Center in recent seasons. Pushkin is the source of the librettos of both.

Pique Dame' Set For Tanglewood Fete

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," at Tanglewood next summer. This will be a major production of the Opera Department of the Berkshire Music Center, the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of which Dr. Koussevitzky is the Director. Boris Goldovsky, who was on leave of absence from the Opera Department last summer, will return and will prepare and direct the production.

"Pique Dame" ("The Queen of Spades") is based on the dramatic short story of Pushkin. At the first performance on Monday, July 30, which is in the second week of the Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct opera for the first time in America. The performance will be repeated. Tickets may be secured by members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, a society of those who, by contributions, endorse the project of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's school at Lenox, Mass. The ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center will begin on July 2nd and continue through the Berkshire Festival to August 12.

Koussevitzky to Conduct His First Opera in U.S. In Tanglewood July 30-31

By E. V. W.

This date is music: Preparations complete for the opening, the next day, of the Yaddo Festival of Contemporary Music in Saratoga Springs.

STUDENTS ARE ENROLLING for the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky director, July 2 to Aug. 12, in Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

THE CENTER is a summer music school maintained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with Berkshire Festival concerts. A special feature of the 1951 session will be a production of Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame," July 30-31, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky's first appearance in America as a conductor of opera.

ALSO, THERE will be a course for music teachers called Music for Music Educators. This innovation in Music Center courses, will be supervised by Augustus D. Zanzig, director of music in Brookline, Mass. public schools and lecturer on music education in Harvard University. Dr. Koussevitzky heads the Music Center faculty with Aaron Copland assistant director. Luigi Dallapiccola, eminent Italian composer, will come to the States for the first time, to join Copland in the composition department.

IN THE department of instrumental music and conducting, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Lukas Foss, Seymour Lipkin and Howard Shanet will assist Dr. Koussevitzky. Leonard Bernstein, for some years a member of the conducting faculty, will be on leave of absence. Hugh Ross again will be in charge of choral activities. The Festival Chorus will perform Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" under Dr. Koussevitzky in the Berkshire Festival series.

IN CHAMBER MUSIC, Gregor Piatigorsky is chief instructor with William Kroll, associate. There will be 15 concerts during the Berkshire Festival, July 7 to Aug. 12, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, Charles Munch, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, to visit Tanglewood for the first time, and Eleazar de Carvalho. The school will present about 40 performances during its six-week session —choral, opera, orchestral and chamber music concerts. Many of these programs will be in the Theater-Concert Hall. As usual the Boston Symphony concerts will be in the great Shed.

EUGENE ORMANDY, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will direct this program tomorrow night in Central High School: Suite for Strings, Opus 5 by Corelli; the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D Major; an Arioso by Louis Mennini, contemporary composer, whose works are increasing in favor and the Fire Bird Suite by Stravinsky. This will mark the final concert of the season by a visiting musical organization, of high repute. The Philadelphia is recognized among the "greats" of the world. Dave Salmon, Inc. is local manager.

Music News: Koussevitzky To Direct Summer Opera

By ARTHUR BERGER

The news that Tchaikovsky's "Queen of Spades" entered the Covent Garden repertory was received nostalgically in December by some operagoers here. But it now seems we need not envy the English public since this work will be the vehicle for the Berkshire Music Center's major opera production next summer at Tanglewood, Serge Koussevitzky, at its first performance, July 30, will appear in a role new for him in this country, that of opera conductor.

"The Queen of Spades" was first heard in America on March 5, 1910, at the Met, when it was curiously sung in German, one of the three European languages used there for Russian operas, until the saner custom of singing them in English was established as recently as last season, with Mussorgsky's "Khovanchina." Gustav Mahler conducted in 1910, and the cast included Destin, Slezak and Didur. A touring Russian group gave it in its original tongue with Nina Koshetz in 1922 at the New Amsterdam Theater, and other Russian troupes gave it at Mecca Temple (now the City Center) at intervals up to February, 1935. It was in the New Opera Company's repertory in English in 1941 and 1942. Known more familiarly as "Pfque Dame," it is the second of the Tchaikovsky operas that have survived, the other being "Eugene Onegin," heard at the City Center in recent seasons. MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

So far as the general public is concerned, Koussevitzky's death will not change the character of this year's Berkshire Festival a great deal. Charles Munch, the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, was originally scheduled to conduct in the Shed for two weekends. He will now conduct the third except that the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" has been entrusted to Leonard Bernstein and will be given in memory of Koussevitzky.

Quite different will be the story of the Bach, Haydn and Mozart weekends catering to the smaller audiences. Koussevitzky always suffused these with an intimacy all his own. That they will be different in character under Munch is altogether probable, but he has made no significant shifts in the programming.

The great change will undoubtedly be in the atmosphere of the Berkshire Music Center created by Koussevitzky as the major activity at Tanglewood.

WITH Aaron Copland back from the American Academy at Rome, Leonard Bernstein returning from Mexico especially to take over Koussevitsky's work, and Boris Goldovsky returning to head the opera department, the general picture of the functioning of the school will be similar to that of other years.

The show must go on as Koussevitsky would have had it.

The fact that one hundred more students have enrolled to date indicates the vitality of the Center.

The spirit of Koussevitzky will undoubtedly dominate everything that happens in Tanglewood this Summer. Besides the Beethoven Mass, his memory will be evoked by the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the first concert on Saturday and by the Mozart Funeral Music at the opening of the Shed concerts on July 26.

What other years may bring forth no one can know. Koussevitzky fashioned the Center for study "on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance."

In nine sessions the seed has been well planted. The fruit should be good.

Tanglewood Prefers Women Wear Skirts, So It Provides Them

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 2.—(AP)—Tanglewood officials would "prefer" that ladies wear skirts to the famous summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But more and more of the female music lovers have been showing up in slacks or shorts.

Thomas B. Perry Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, plans tonight "to give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform."

He will have ushers hand out wrap-around skirts to the informally clad visitors.

After all, Perry said, women students long have been required to wear skirts at the noted summer school taught by Boston Symphony Orchestra artists.

Tanglewood Crowd Honors Koussevitzky By Holding Applause

Lenox, Mass., July 27.—(AP)—Instead of the customary applause some 6000 persons stood reverently silent last night when Charles Munch, [redacted] Symphony Orchestra conductor, concluded his first piece at opening of the Berkshire Music Festival.

The piece was Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, played in honor of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the 77th anniversary of Koussevitzky's birth and the first time he missed the opening of the concerts at Tanglewood since it became a center of music 13 seasons ago.

Munch asked the audience not to applaud and suggested that a moment of silence be observed, instead.

400 Students Arrive at Music Center

A DREAM COME TRUE: Nicholas D. Cannici (right), 1940 Pittsfield High graduate, reports for six weeks at the Berkshire Music Center to Thomas D. Perry Jr., executive secretary, and Miss Edith Bossler, registrar. Assistant professor at Evansville (Ind.) College, after earning a master's degree in music at Indiana University and playing three years in an air force band, he returns with his family for the summer at Tanglewood that he has desired for 10 years. Mr. Cannici, who plays both the bassoon and the clarinet, is an "alumnus" of the Pittsfield High band and the Stanley Club Junior Symphony. He is presently studying for his doctorate.

Tanglewood Plans Opening Tomorrow at 4

TANGLEWOOD — Four hundred students and 50 members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center have arrived in town for the official opening of the Center tomorrow at 4 PM. Many of the students, who are enrolled for the first time at Tanglewood, have been spending hours touring the grounds overlooking Lake Mahkeenac, after signing in with the registrar, Miss Edith Bossler.

The climax of their course will come in the last three weeks, when they will hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conductor, in the nine major Berkshire Festival concerts. Beginning Friday evening they will themselves give programs open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. They will learn by performance. The school offers no individual instruction. That is given, when desired, by private lessons with the faculty.

According to preliminary statistics, 25 students are from other countries, including 10 from Canada. There are more men than women. One hundred twenty-five women will live at Lenox School and 115 men at Wheatley, the 21½-acre estate of the late Mrs. Carlos deHeredia that was purchased last year for the school. Others have rooms in hotels or private homes, or have rented houses.

They will lunch at a cafeteria on the Tanglewood grounds. Breakfast and dinner will be served at Wheatley and the Lenox School. When they want to relax they may swim, boat or picnic on the waterfront. They will work everywhere on the estate — composition in the main house, conducting in the Shed, shell and barn, musical analysis in the garage, opera in the theatre and workshop and practicing wherever they can find a quiet spot.

The grounds are open to visitors daily from 4 to 8, and the cafeteria from 12:30 to 2:00 and before concerts.

More than 30 programs by students and faculty, including the Friday night symphony and choral concerts, chamber music, opera and organ recitals will give an opportunity to hear and perform some of the best in classical and contemporary music.

Under the direction of Dr. Hugh Ross, conductor of tthe Festival chorus and head of the choral conducting section, the students are rehearsing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," which they will sing at the close of the exercises tomorrow.

The trustees of the Boston orchestra will be represented by Dr. Lewis Perry, who will preside, Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, who gave an address at the orchestra's farewell dinner for Dr. Koussevitsky when he retired and C. D. Jackson. Aaron Copland, assistant director, will introduce the faculty.

Leonard Bernstein, who has cancelled plans for a summer in Mexico to assume Dr. Koussevitky's work as director of orchestral conducting and orchestra, and to conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in his memory on Aug. 9, will address the students. Tea will be served in the Tanglewood garden. Admission to the exercises will be by invitation.

Berkshire Hills, June 30—The Berkshires, which in recent years have become known as one of the musical cultural centers in America, will open for the coming season tomorrow when the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center will have exercises in the theater-concert hall, beginning at 3.30 at Tanglewood, Lenox. Rev. Theodore Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give an address, and Leonard Bernstein, the conductor, will speak in tribute to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which furnished the music programs at Tanglewood. Dr. Koussevitzky, who died recently, was the founder and director of the music school. Aaron Copeland, assistant director of the Music Center, will introduce the faculty.

The exercises will have traditional closing established at the opening of the first session, the singing by the students the "Allelulia Chorus" by Randall Thompson. Tea will follow in the Tanglewood garden. Dr. Lewis Perry a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and chairman of the Society of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Another feature at Lenox this season is the sculpture exhibit given by the Students' Workshop, which opened today on the lawn of the Lenox library and will continue until July 10. The exhibit is open daily from 1 to 7. Twenty-five have pieces on exhibition. Several of them have been made by students of Miss Franc Epping of Lenox, well-known sculpturess. Among those exhibiting from the county are Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Sande of Ashley Falls, Mrs. Hartwell Homer of Great Barrington, Mrs. Nathan Horwitt and son, William, of Stockbridge.

A familiar figure in the community life of Lenox is to retire from his duties as postmaster of Lenox. He is Charles H. McCarty, postmaster since 1936, who started as clerk in the office in 1913. Mr. McCarty who retires today, has had a wide acquaintance among summer visitors in Lenox. Since he first became associated with the Lenox office he has seen the business enjoy a big increase due to the Tanglewood concerts.

Season Opens Next Week End At Tanglewood

Lenox, June 30—Charles Munch is to arrive by plane tomorrow at Boston from a series of concerts in France and Italy and will drive to Lenox to open the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with two Bach concerts next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. The French conductor, who has completed his second season as the music director of this orchestra, is taking the concerts which the late Serge Koussevitzky had intended to lead. The programs, slightly different from those originally announced, will be as follows:

Saturday, July 7—Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Concerto for three pianos in C major (soloists, Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, Ralph Berkowitz); Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Brandenburg Concerto No. 6; Brandenburg Concerto No. 4.

Sunday, Juy 8—Bach: Cantata "Der Zufriedengesiellte Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto for three pianos in D minor (soloists, Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, Ralph Berkowitz); Magnificat in D.

The opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center will take place at Tanglewood tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 and will be followed by a reception in the garden.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Dr. Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church in Boston, and trustee of the orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work Monday in each of the five departments.

Our Hilltown Neighbors

By DAVID J. MALCOLM

The season at Tanglewood opens on Sunday with exercises of the Music Center in the theater-concert hall, to be followed by a tea in the garden later in the afternoon. These opening exercises are always delightful for it is the first occasion when young people who are to work together and study together for the summer at Tanglewood appear in public and meet their fellow students.

We met George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Cambridge at commencement. George, who is Harvard 1911, and whom we knew as an undergraduate in college, informs us that much the same staff as last year will be in charge of things at Tanglewood again this coming session.

Mrs. George Edmans, who is almost a charter member of the Tanglewood movement, but who in recent years has spent a number of summers with her husband while he was stationed in Greece, will again head the public relations staff. Nicholas Somerfield of Northampton, whose press releases received much favorable comment a year ago, will assist Mrs. Edmans.

Music Center Pays Honor to Koussevitzky

LENOX, July 1—Some 380 students enrolled for the ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center today heard the Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declare at the opening exercises that the center would carry on "not without our founder-director, Serge Koussevitzky, but because of him."

Dr. Lewis E. Perry, trustee of the Boston Symphony and chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, presided. Among visitors were many leading Eastern musicians. Leonard Bernstein of Boston and a faculty board will assume direction of the center this season.

Distinguished guests included Mrs. Koussevitzky; Composer Howard Hanson from the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., and Dr. Harold Spivacke, music director of the Library of Congress.

The faculty includes Composer Aaron Copland of New York, chairman; Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony; Augustus D. Zanzig Brookline music director; Boris Goldovsky Boston; Gregor Piatigorsky, Beverly Hills, Calif.; William Kroll, and Hugh Ross, both of New York.

Dr. Munch to Introduce His Concerto Here

An original concerto written in France by Lukas Foss, 29, who formerly lived and studied music composition in a Huntington ave., flat near Symphony Hall, will be personally introduced by Dr. Charles Munch next season as he directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Munch, who arrived at Logan International Airport yesterday after a two-month tour of France and Italy, said that he was first attracted to Foss' concerto in Paris when he heard it on a radio program.

Dr. Munch said that he plans to play several symphonies at Tanglewood in memory of Dr. Koussevitsky. Among them will be the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion, Mozart funeral music and Missa Solemnis.

To Play Foss Concerto

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returning yesterday from France en route to the Berkshire Festival, said that he has brought back with him a new piano concerto by Lukas Foss, now studying in Italy. Mr. Munch plans to present the work during the next season of symphony concerts.

Airs Tanglewood Symphony Plans

Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, on his arrival at Boston Airport yesterday from France, reported that he was bringing with him the composition of a Boston conductor to be played for the first time at the next symphony season.

Well Known Here

The composition, one of many new ones he heard and picked up in Italy, England and France for use here, is a piano concerto by Lukas Foss, who is now working and studying in Italy under a fellowship of the American Academy of Rome.

Foss, whom Munch characterized as having a great talent was well known here as a composer and director when the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky appointed him official pianist of Boston Symphony.

Vacationing in Europe since early May, the French conductor cut short his visit on the death of Dr. Koussevitzky to return here to take full charge of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox.

His first concert Saturday with the small chamber music group will be a memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. He will conduct the funeral music of Mozart. Leonard Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in a third memorial, August 9.

Munch's visit to Tanglewood will be the first since he visited the French composer, Arthur Honegger, there three years ago. He said he had many plans for the music festival but contemplates no changes.

"I hope to carry on in the same spirit as Dr. Koussevitzky," he said.

Concerning the discussion caused by his dropping the Sibelius Symphony from the Tanglewood program as originally scheduled by Dr. Koussevitzky, he explained that this would be the only change and that he planned to play it at the next symphony season.

MUSIC CENTER AT TANGLEWOOD OPENS SEASON

Pay Tribute to Late Dr. Koussevitzky Who Made Berkshire Festival Famous

Lenox, July 1—The gates of Tanglewood were open this afternoon for the opening program of the ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center which was held in the concert theater hall. Hosts for the program were the trustees of the Boston Symphony and the faculty of the center. Attendance today was by invitation.

Miss Late Dr. Koussevitzky

Although it was the first time that the school opened with out Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the eminent conductor who recently died, it seemed as if his spirit hovered over the exercises as tribute was paid him. All in attendance were in agreement that the remarks by Leonard Bernstein, protege of the deceased director of the music center, were the highlight of the program.

Gives Eulogy

Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said in part:

"The influence of Serge Koussevitzky was world wide. Many here can speak of that much better than I, but at least I could catch the spirit of this man as I hope you will. For it is his spirit which will carry us on this summer. This is Serge Koussevitzky's year, and the faculty of the school will not fail to make it that.

It is trite to say that he was dynamic. He had a gift for animating everybody around him. He wanted perfection and the members of the orchestra know that in order to get perfection he insisted on what shakespeare called "damnable iteration."

Celebrities Attend

Visiting celebrities included Luigi Dallapiccola, a composer from Florence, Italy; Agusutus D'Zanzig, director of music in public schools of Brookline, a lecturer at Harvard and the head of the new department for the music educator here at the center; Dr. Howard Hanson, a composer-conductor of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y.; Dr. Harold Spivacke, head of the music division of the Library of Congress.

It was announced that in the spirit of the wishes of Dr. Koussevitzky, the responsibility for this season's artistic direction of the Berkshire Music Center has been placed in the hands of a faculty board consisting of Copeland, Bernstein, Burgin, Piatigorsky, Kroll, Ross and Goldovsky. Mr. Copeland who has been assistant director of the center since 1946 will serve as the chairman of this new board of control.

The exercises were brought to a close with "Alleluia" by Randall Thompson, with the student body participating under the direction of Hugh Ross.

Koussevitzky's Successor Arrives From France

Boston, July 1 (AP)—Charles Munch, successor to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here today from France.

The 60-year-old maestro leaves tomorrow for Tanglewood in Lenox to conduct the Berkshire Festival Concerts made famous by Koussevitzky.

At Tanglewood Munch will dedicate three concerts in memory of Koussevitzky along with the original program as set up by the late conductor. The first memorium will be next Saturday, the second on July 26 and the third, Aug. 9.

Munch brought back a new composition by Lukas Foss, official pianist for the Boston Symphony. Foss is in Italy on a fellowship at the American Academy in Rome. The composition will be played for the first time at the next symphony season in the fall.

Cape Cod Solon Offers Tanglewood As TV Substitute

Special to THE EAGLE

BOSTON—A Cape Cod legislator tried—without much success—to sell a Berkshire colleague on the virtues of Tanglewood at a State House hearing this morning on the bill to permit TV facilities on Mount Greylock.

Representative Joseph N. Roach, North Adams Democrat, complained that unless the bill passes, many Berkshire residents will never get to hear and see television.

"If people out there want something to see and hear," interrupted Senator Edward C. Stone, Osterville Republican and chairman of the Conservation Committee, "why don't they go to Tanglewood and get some real entertainment?"

Roache replied that Tanglewood is too long a trip for Northern Berkshire residents, but Stone seemed unimpressed.

"Why, just this week a great conductor, Dr. Munch, came all the way from Europe just to go to Tanglewood," the chairman stated.

Notes of Music and Musicians

Serge Koussevitzky's death last Monday placed several question marks around the forthcoming Berkshire festival at Tanglewood. He was director of the Berkshire Music center and director emeritus of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He was scheduled to conduct 12 concerts by the orchestra, including a Bach-Mozart-Haydn series and a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis." In addition he was to direct Tschaikowsky's opera, "Pique Dame," as a function of the center's opera department. Other conducting assignments are held by Charles Munch, Koussevitzky's successor as director of the Boston, and Eleazar de Carvalho. Aaron Copland served as assistant director of the center under Koussevitzky.

Serge Koussevitzky

Koussevitzky's last appearance in Chicago was on Feb. 10, when he conducted the touring Israel Philharmonic in Orchestra hall. Interviewed at that time by a Tribune reporter he revealed that he was at work on his memoirs. He was born in Russia June 30, 1874, and began his 25 year reign with the Boston Symphony in 1914.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, director of the New York Philharmonic and a guest conductor this summer at Ravinia, will be given the honorary degree, doctor of music, at the 84th commencement exercises of the Chicago Musical college Thursday night in Orchestra hall. The same award will be made to Nicolai Malko, conductor of the Grant Park Symphony, and Felix Labunski, musicologist.

A substantial increase in its automobile parking areas is promised by the Ravinia Festival association for this summer, largely thru the expansion of facilities approachable at a north turn-off from County Line rd. at the first road east of the North Western and North Shore railroads' parallel tracks. It is expected that 300 additional cars will be accommodated.

MUNCH WILL OPEN BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning the first week of July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on July 7. He will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theatre-concert hall and in addition to the two weeks of shed concerts already announced will also conduct the final week of concerts. Eleazer de Carvalho will lead the concert on August 5 as planned, and Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis already scheduled for Thursday evening, August 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" and the school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos."

There is no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments.

Aaron Copland who has been this winter in the American Academy at Rome, will return in time for the school's opening exercises on Sunday, July 1.

Charles Munch who has been conducting concerts in Paris and elsewhere will close his European season in Strasbourg June 25 and will return to America to arrive in Lenox for the opening Bach concerts. Mr. Munch has sent word that there will be a minimum of change in the programs originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. Full program details will be announced shortly.

Berkshire Music Center Begins Ninth Year With Vow to Continue Koussevitzky's Ideals

Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 1—Friends, students and faculty of the Berkshire Music Center gathered in the Theatre Concert Hall at Tanglewood for the ninth season to pay tribute to the creative genius of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, their late director and creator of the music school, and rededicated themselves to continue, guided by Dr. Koussevitzky's ideals.

On the platform of the theatre sat the trustees of the center and some forty members of the faculty. The student body of 380 and friends of the school made up the audience, which included Mrs. Koussevitzky.

Dr. Lewis Perry, chairman of The Friends Society and a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, presided. Dr. Theodore Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and a trustee, praised Dr. Koussevitzky's standards and dramatic ability. He ended his tribute by likening Dr. Koussevitzky to Moses when he descended from the Mount: "Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone," he quoted.

Aaron Copland, chairman of the faculty, then asked all present to rise for a moment of silence in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. The members of the faculty afterwards were individually introduced, and it was announced that Luigi Dallapola, Italian composer, would be the guest teacher.

The final tribute of the afternoon was by Leonard Bernstein, former protege of Dr. Koussevitzky, who will assume his work as head of the Department of Orchestral Conducting.

Mr. Bernstein reminded the students that eleven years before, he, too, had sat in their place. What inspired him, she said, was the central line, a line of mystery and fire, the line to be followed by dedicated people. This was what Dr. Koussevitzky brought to Tanglewood, according to the tradition established at the opening exercises of the first season in 1940.

In the spirit of the wishes of Dr. Koussevitzky, the responsibility for this season's artistic direction of the Berkshire Music Center had been placed in the hands of a faculty board to be composed of the heads of the departments—Mr. Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Hugh Ross, Mr. Copland and Boris Goldovsky. Mr. Copland, who has been assistant director since 1946, will serve as chairman.

Munch To Conduct In Koussevitzky's Place

Boston, June 12 (?) — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements so he could open the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood July 7 in place of Serge Koussevitsky, who died eight days ago.

A Symphony hall announcement said Munch will conduct the Bach-Havdn-Mozart series of concerts between July 7 and 22 — originally assigned to Koussevitsky.

Munch Arrives in Lenox; Music School Opens

TANGLEWOOD—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here this afternoon to pick up where his predecessor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, left off.

Vacation Cut Short

(Mr. Munch, who arrived home last night from a European vacation cut short by the death of Dr. Koussevitzky, was accompanied to Tanglewood from Boston by George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He will be registered at Elm Court.)

Mr. Munch will conduct two memorial concerts for Dr. Koussevitzky during the Festival this year. He announced today that he had brought back from Europe a new piano concerto by Lukas Foss, former pianist with the BSO, which will be performed for the first time during the orchestra's regular season. Mr. Foss, a former member of the faculty at the Music Center, is now studying in Rome.

800 at Exercises

They arrived to find the Berkshire Music Center in full swing following the official opening yesterday when a crowd of 800 heard glowing tributes paid to Dr. Koussevitzky, who founded the school 11 years ago.

The opening was also marked by the announcement that "in the spirit of the wishes of Dr. Koussevitzky, the responsibility for this season's artistic direction of the Center has been placed in the hands of a faculty board composed of the heads of the departments." They are Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Hugh Ross, Aaron Copland and Boris Goldovsky. Mr. Copland, who has been assistant director since 1946, will serve as chairman of the board. Ralph Berkowitz has been named dean of the school.

Dr. Lewis Perry, head of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, presided at the exercises in the Theatre-Concert Hall. Seated among the students and others invited to the event was Dr. Koussevitzky's widow, who remained for a short time after the program ended to meet close friends.

In his opening Dr. Perry noted that "this is the first time the school has opened without Dr. Koussevitzky," and told his audience that those who knew the late conductor realized he would not have wanted the opening turned into a memorial service.

Dr. Koussevitzky was "too alive, too intense, too forward-looking for that," said Dr. Perry. "We are opening a school which was his dream. The school would never have come into being without him and he breathed into it his own unconquerable spirit."

Aaron Copland and Leonard Bernstein praised the work of Dr. Koussevitzky in their talks, directed mostly to the nearly 400 students who were assembled in the hall.

"It seems to me," said Mr. Copland, "that Dr. Koussevitzky's spirit is so clearly among us that it would be impossible for us not to carry on our work in the meaning of that spirit." In a sense, he added, "I feel we are rededicating the school." At this point the students, faculty and others attending the exercises rose for a moment of silence in memory of the founder of the Music Center.

Introduced by Dr. Perry as the man "who received most from Koussevitzky and gave most in return," Mr. Bernstein recalled his early days as a student at Tanglewood. He emphasized the "magic" which Dr. Koussevitzky applied to the operation of the school. When Koussevitzky began to speak, declared Bernstein, he spoke of a "central line—a line of fire and mystery, the line to be followed by dedicated people. To him we were, by our very presence on that day, automatically dedicated people; boys and girls who had found music a center, a core, a backbone for the service of our lives. . . . We ate, drank and dreamed music—all kinds of music—and always under the aegis of a standard that knew no compromise, that tolerated no mediocrity."

Musical Universe

Mr. Bernstein described Tanglewood as a musical universe where for six weeks, a young musician is subjected to gravitational pulls, magnetic fields, electrical impulses, varying atmospheres, and a changing topography.

"What Tanglewood hopes," he added, "and what Koussevitzky desired, was that the student emerge from this model universe with a conception of his own true orbit.

"Every note that you play," he told the students, "will be played in a tribute to him."

KOUSSEVITZKY TRIBUTE: Members of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center and guests at the formal opening of the school at Tanglewood stood in silence for a moment yesterday in tribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the Music Center and retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who died last month. In the foreground is Aaron Copland, assistant director of the school since 1946, and behind him, left to right, Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Music Center, Leonard Bernstein, Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and Luigi Dallapiccola, composer from Florence, Italy.

In Brief

Yesterday's formal opening of the Berkshire Music Center was probably the finest tribute Serge Koussevitzky has received, for it went far beyond a mere memorial service. It showed that the indomitable, creative spirit he brought to the founding of the Center lives on in those who are responsible for keeping it in the forefront of the musical world. to the continuation and development of Dr. Koussevitzky's aims in the Berkshire Music Center.

Rev. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, who gave an address at the orchestra's farewell dinner for Dr. Koussevitzky following his retirement as the BSO director, mentioned in his talk here yesterday that since the famed musician's death some people have wondered whether the school would go on without him.

"My answer officially has been that it will go on because of him," he stated. He reviewed at length Dr. Koussevitzky's work in building up the Boston Symphony Orchestra into one of the great symphony orchestras of the world.

Before closing the exercises Dr. Perry paid tribute to Mrs. Guy P. Gannett, former president of the National Federation of Music Clubs, who was responsible for building the Little Red House, the replica of Nataniel Hawthorne's cottage. Mrs. Gannett died in May.

The exercises closed with the students singing Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," under the direction of Hugh Ross.

Berkshire Festival To Be Opened By Munch

BOSTON (AP) — Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements so he could open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 7 in place of Serge Koussevitzky, who died eight days ago.

A Symphony Hall announcement said Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series of concerts between July 7 and 22—originailly assigned to Koussevitzky.

Munch was to have made his Tanglewood debut conducting the first two weeks of concerts in the Music Shed July 26-Aug. 4 and Koussevitzky was to have closed the shed concerts Aug. 9-12. Now Munch will conduct all three weeks.

Leonard Bernstein will return from Mexico to take over the Berkshire Music Center which Koussevitzky founded at Tanglewood.

The announcement said also that Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis Aug. in memory of Koussevitzy at t invitation of Munch.

Tanglewood Will Honor Koussevitzky

Beethovan's "Missa Solemnis," which Serge Koussevitzky was to have conducted at the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood this summer, will be played as a memorial to the famous conductor under the baton of Leonard Bernstein.

Charles Munch, who succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has cut short his European tour to return to America immediately to take over the task of conducting the six Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts with which Dr. Koussevitzky intended to open the festival.

Mr. Munch invited Mr. Bernstein to conduct Beethoven Mass Aug. 19 because of his close association with the late founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, first as pupil and then as a member of the faculty. Mr. Bernstein also will take over Koussevitzky's work in the school.

Mr. Munch will conduct all the other concerts in main festival series by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra except that on Aug. 5, which is regularly scheduled for Eleazar Carvalho.

Mr. Bernstein had been given leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer and was in Mexico when he was recalled. Aaron Copland, who has been at the American Academy at Rome through the winter, also will return in time for the Berkshire Center's opening exercises July 1.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," which Dr. Koussevitzky intended to do. The school also will produce Richard Strauss' "Adriadne auf Naxos." There will be no change in the schedules of the choral, chamber music and composition departments.

Charles Munch to Be Present at Opening Of Berkshire Festival

Boston, Mass., June 14—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning to this country the first week in July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 7, a festival spokesman announced here today. Mr. Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theatre-concert hall, and, in addition to the two weeks of shed concerts already announced, will conduct the festival's final week of concerts.

Eleazar De Carvalho will lead the concert of August 5, as planned. Leonard Bernstein, on Mr. Munch's invitation, will conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, scheduled for Thursday evening, August 9, in memory of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, will continue in accordance with plans already announced. Leonard Bernstein, at one time a student of Dr. Koussevitzky, and later his close associate at the school, has returned from Mexico to take over its founder's work there. Previously, he had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikowsky's Pique Dame. The school will also produce Richard Strauss' Ariadne Auf Naxos.

There will be no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music, and composition departments.

Aaron Copland, who spent the winter in the American Academy in Rome, will return in time for the school's opening exercises Sunday, July 1.

Dr. Munch to Take Over Koussevitzky's Duties at Tanglewood

His successor as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the outstanding protege will take over the duties which Serge Koussevitzky was to have performed this summer at the Berkshire Symphonic festival and the Berkshire Music center at Tanglewood, Lenox.

Except for this and for the fact that the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Aug. 9 will be offered as a memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky, his death last week will make no changes in the summer Tanglewood program.

Dr. Koussevitzky was to have conducted the six preliminary concerts of Bach, Mozart and Haydn works by musicians from the Boston orchestra in the theater-music hall on three successive Saturdays and Sundays starting July 7, and the final series of three major symphony concerts by the entire orchestra in the music shed, starting Thursday evening, Aug. 9. Under the rearrangement of plans announced today, Dr. Charles Munch, Dr. Koussevitzky's successor as director of the Boston orchestra, will return from Europe to take the Bach-Mozart-Haydn series and the last two concerts in Series C. The first of those three concerts was to have been devoted to the Beethoven mass and Leonard Bernstein, Dr. Koussevitzky's outstanding protege, will conduct it as a memorial to the noted orchestra leader, on Dr. Munch's invitation.

Mr. Bernstein also will take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the Music center of which he was director and one of the chief instructors. Bernstein had obtained a leave from the center for this summer which he planned to spend in Mexico but has cancelled those plans.

Dr. Munch, as originally scheduled, will conduct the first and second series of symphonic festival concerts in the music shed.

Die Berkshire Festwochen werden am 7. Juli eröffnet

Von FRED LOW

Die Berkshire Festwochen verdanken ihren Ursprung der Überlassung des Dan Hanna Gutes in Interlaken bei Stockbridge an Henry K. Hadley, der im Jahre 1934 bemüht war, Gönner zu finden, die Festveranstaltungen zu finanzieren. Die Gemeinde bewilligte einen geringfügigen Betrag, der zum Errichten eines Podiums mit einer abschirmenden Wand und zum Aufstellen von Bänken für die Hörer benutzt wurde. 65 Mitglieder der New Yorker Philharmonie wurden für drei Konzerte im Spätaugust des Jahres 1934 engagiert, Dr. Hadley dirigierte das Ensemble und im Herbst des gleichen Jahres wurden die Festspiele bei der Behörde als "Non profit Organization" eingetragen. Im darauffolgenden Jahr leitete Dr. Hadley wieder drei Konzerte, das Orchester bestand aus Musikern der bedeutendsten Ensembles der "Eastern States". In einem Konzert wirkte der neugegründete Chor des Berkshire Musical Association mit, der aus 200 Sängern (Direktor Horace Hunt aus Dalton) zusammengesetzt war. Obgleich der Besuch dieser Konzerte relativ bedeutend war, es kamen durchschnittlich 3000 Personen zu jeder Veranstaltung, ergab sich ein Defizit, das von Privatpersonen ausgeglichen wurden. Am Schluß dieser Saison wurde der Beschluß gefaßt, das Boston Symphonie Orchester und seinen Dirigenten Serge Koussevitzky als ständige Mitwirkende zu engagieren. Drei Konzerte fanden Anfang August 1936 statt und die Festspiele übersiedelten nach "Holmwood", dem Besitz von Mrs. Margaret Emerson. Der große Erfolg führte dann zur endgültigen Wahl von Tanglewood als Festspielgelände, das von Mrs. Gorham Brooks den Veranstaltern überlassen wurde. 1937 wurde ein großes Zelt gebaut, das mehr als 5000 Personen fassen konnte, die Hörer kamen von 32 Staaten, Kanada und von Europa. Die Konzerte wurden im Rundfunk übertragen und nach Beendigung der Konzertserie wurden 80,000 Dollar aufgebracht, um eine Halle zu errichten, die auch bei ungünstigem Wetter die Abhaltung der Konzerte ermöglichte.

Die Berkshire Festwochen 1951 werden am 7. Juli eröffnet, es sind die ersten Festspiele ohne Serge Koussevitzky, dem Mitbegründer und Dirigenten der Veranstaltungen, sein Nachfolger in der Leitung des Boston Symphonie Orchesters, Charles Munch, wird auch den Großteil der Konzerte in Tanglewood dirigieren und das Gedenken Serge Koussevitzkys mit dem Vortrag des Schlußchores "Es ist vollbracht" aus der Matthäus-Passion von Johann Sebastian Bach und der Trauermusik Mozarts ehren. Leonard Bernstein wird das Konzert am 9. August, das unter der Leitung Koussevitzkys vorgesehen war, Beethovens "Missa Solemnis" dirigieren, die ebenfalls als Gedenkfeier für den langjährigen Leiter der Berkshire Festwochen zur Wiedergabe gelangt.

Die Veranstaltungen in Tanglewood werden mit der Konzertserie Bach-Haydn-Mozart sämtlich unter der Leitung von Charles Munch eröffnet. Am 7. und 8. Juli ist das Programm Johann Sebastian Bach gewidmet, Brandenburg Konzert Nr. 3 Konzert C-Dur für drei Klaviere, Brandenburg Konzert Nr. 3, Schlußchor aus der Matthäus Passion und Brandenburg Konzert Nr. 4 und 6. — Hugh Ross dirigiert am 8. Juli die Kantata "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus" und im gleichen Konzert kommt das Konzert D-Moll für drei Klaviere und das "Magnificat" (Dirigent Munch) zum Vortrag. Die Solopianisten in beiden Veranstaltungen sind Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera und Ralph Berkowitz.

Werke von Joseph Haydn kommen Samstag abend, 14. Juli, und Sonntag nachmittag, 15. Juli, zur Aufführung. Das Programm lautet: Samstag, Symphonie No. 88 G-Dur, Klavierkonzert D-Dur (Samuel Lipkin), Symphonie Concertante (Geige, Cello und Fagott), Symphonie No. 104, London. Sonntag: Symphonie No. 103, Cellokonzert (Solist Gregor Piatigorsky), Symphonien No. 101 und 92. Die Serie wird mit zwei Konzerten Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart gewidmet beendet. Im Programm sind Symphonie No. 35, "Haffner", Missa Brevis K. 192 (Hugh Ross als Dirigent), Eine kleine Nachtmusik, Adagio und Fuge für Streicher, Symphonie No. 39. — Sonntag, 22. Juli: Divertimento für Streicher und zwei Hörner, K. 287, Violinkonzert A-Dur (William Kroll) und Symphonie No. 38 "Prager".

Gregor Piatigorsky,
Solist bei den Berkshire Festwochen im Haydn - Cellokonzert

Charles Munch eröffnet die erste Serie in der großen Halle (Freiluftbühne) Donnerstag, den 26. Juli mit der Trauermusik Mozarts K. 477, das restliche Programm enthält Schumann, Symphonie Nr. 4 und Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique." Samstag, 28. Juli kommt die Ouvertüre zu "Oberon" von Carl Maria von Weber zur Wiedergabe, ferner spielen die Bostoner die sechste Symphonie Prokofieffs und Claudio Arrau ist Solist im Klavierkonzert Nr. 2 von Brahms. — Barbers Ouvertüre "The school for scandal", Coplands "Quiet City", Schubert Symphonie Nr. 4 und Cesar Franck Symphonie in D-Moll sind im Programm des Sonntag - Nachmittagskonzertes, 29. Juli.

Die Serie B wird Donnerstag, den 2. August mit der Ouvertüre zu "Genoveva" von Schumann eingeleitet, ferner werden vorgetragen Beethoven "Pastorale" Symphonie, Ravel Rhapsodie Espagnole" und Roussel Symphonie Nr. 3. — Es folgen am Samstag, den 4. August Händels "Wassermusik", Bartok "Musik für Streicher und Schlagwerk", Richard Strauß "Don Juan", Saint Saens Symphonie Nr. 3 (mit Orgel). — Eleazar de Carvalho, einer der bevorzugten Schüler Koussevitzkys leitet das Sonntag Nachmittagskonzert am 5. August mit folgendem Programm Guarnieri Symphonie No. 2, Prokofieff Klavierkonzert No. 2 (Jorge Bolet), Moussorgsky-Ravel "Bilder aus einer Ausstellung". — Leonard Bernstein dirigiert Donnerstag, 9. August, die "Missa Solemnis" von Beethoven, dieses Konzert stellt die offizielle Trauerfeier für Serge Koussevitzky dar. Mitwirkend Adele Addison (Sopran), Eunice Alberts (Alt), David Lloyd (Tenor), James Pease (Baß). — Die beiden Schlußkonzerte werden wieder von Charles Munch geleitet, der als Programm nachstehende Kompositionen gewählt hat: 11. August Beethoven, Symphonie No. 1, Honegger Symphonie No. 5 Tschaikowsky Symphonie No. 6 "Pathetique" und Sonntag, 12. August, Brahms, Variationen über ein Thema von Haydn und die Symphonien No. 2 und 4.

Das Operadepartment bringt Aufführungen von Tschaikowskys "Pique Dame" und Richard Strauß "Aridne auf Naxos". Boris Goldovsky, der zum Leiter der Kurse nach dem Ableben Koussevitzkys ernannt wurde hat die Regie der beiden Vorstellungen inne, er wird auch die musikalische Leitung übernehmen. — Zu den Kursen in Kompositionslehre wird Aaron Copland, der im Augenblick in Rom weilt zeitgerecht in Tanglewood eintreffen die von Koussevitzky vorgesehenen Klassen in Chor und Kammermusik werden keine Änderung erfahren.

33 Staaten und 11 Länder sind in der Liste der Studenten vertreten, die im Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood für die verschiedenn Kurse eingeschrieben sind. Die Klassen werden am 2. Juli eröffnet. 364 Musikstudenten nehmen an ihnen teil, die Dauer der Kurse ist für sechs Wochen festgesetzt worden. Neun Musiker kommen aus Kanada, vier von Israel, je zwei von Holland und Cuba und je einer von Norwegen, Italien, Ägypten, Brasilien, Mexico und Schweiz. New York ist selbstverständlich der Staat, der die meisten Studenten entsendet, unter den 88 Musikern sind 50 von New York City, Massachusetts mit 46 Studenten nimmt den zweiten Platz in der Liste ein, 14 kommen aus Boston, Brooklyn und Cambridge und Pennsylvania steht an dritter Stelle mit 40, ferner Illinois mit 15. Die Kurse beinhalten Dirigieren mit Orchesterspiel, Leitung Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eliazar de Carvalho, Seymour Lipkin und Howard Shanet. Aaron Copland und Luigi Dallapiccola leiten die Kompositionskurse, Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Jean Bedetti, Ralph Berkowitz, Fernand Gillet und Ruth Posselt sind in der Kammermusikklasse tätig. Hugh Ross übernimmt die Chordirigenten und Gesangsklasse und alle Opernklassen werden von Boris Goldovsky geführt. Solfege (Katherine Wolff), Analyse klassinscher und moderner Werke (Seymour Lipkin) und Musik für den Pädagogen (Augustus D. Zenzig). Die Mitglieder des Lehrkörpers rekrutieren sich zum größten Teil aus dem Boston Symphonie Orchester. Die Vorstellungen der Studenten sind den "Freunden des Berkshire Music Center", die zur Erhaltung der Kurse beitragen, zugänglich.

American in London Was Aaron Copland

NEW YORK, June 16.—London is his kind of a place: A group of Americans, congregated in a lobby during the "interval" of an Albert hall concert, found themselves joined by the familiar glasses and unmistakable profile of Aaron Copland.

"You're supposed to be in Tanglewood," was the accusing greeting.

"No," he answered, "I'm supposed to be in Rome, composing."

However, Rome to London is hardly more than New York to Detroit in American terms, and Copland had dropped over to direct the first English performance of his Concerto for Clarinet and Orchestra at the Victoria and Albert museum. He will, however, leave late in June for the States, where he will take over direction of the Tanglewood school.

Munch to Open Berkshire Music Fete

Will Carry on For Koussevitzky

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and will return the first week of July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 7, the Symphony Hall office announced today.

There will be a "minimum of change" in the programs originally planned by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who died last week.

WILL CONDUCT CONCERTS

Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall and in addition to the two weeks of shed concerts already announced, also will conduct the final week of concerts.

Eleazer de Carvalho will lead the concert Aug. 5, as planned. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis already scheduled for Thursday evening, Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue, with Leonard Bernstein, Dr. Koussevitzky's close associate on the faculty, taking over his work.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame." The school also will produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne and Naxos."

Aaron Copeland will return from Rome in time for the school's opening exercises July 1.

No changes will occur in plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments.

American in London Was Aaron Copland

NEW YORK, June 16.—London is his kind of a place: A group of Americans, congregated in a lobby during the "interval" of an Albert hall concert, found themselves joined by the familiar glasses and unmistakable profile of Aaron Copland.

"You're supposed to be in Tanglewood," was the accusing greeting.

"No," he answered, "I'm supposed to be in Rome, composing." However, Rome to London is hardly more than New York to Detroit in American terms, and Copland had dropped over to direct the first English performance of his Concerto for Clarinet and Orchestra at the Victoria and Albert museum. He will, however, leave late in June for the States, where he will take over direction of the Tanglewood school.

Munch to Close European Season June 25, Return to Conduct in Tanglewood

By E. V. W.

This date in music: 1818, Charles Gounod, French composer, born in Paris; 1882, Igor Stravinsky, noted Russian composer, born on St. Igor's Day; Pierre Luboshutz, Russian-American pianist, born in Odessa.

CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been conducting concerts in Paris and elsewhere on the Continent, will close his European season June 25 in Strasbourg and will return to America, arriving in Lenox, Mass., the first week in July to conduct opening of the Berkshire Festival in Tanglewood July 7.

THERE WILL be a minimum of change in the Berkshire programs originally planned by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Festival director for many seasons, and creator of the Berkshire Music Center. The Center is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the Berkshire Center faculty, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the School. Bernstein had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

BEETHOVEN'S Missa Solemnis, scheduled for a night concert Thursday, Aug. 9, will be conducted by Bernstein and will be in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar De Carvalho will lead the Aug. 5 concert, as planned. Dr Carvalho, in Syracuse last winter to conduct the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, had arranged to go to his native South America for late May and part of June. When in Syracuse, following the orchestra concert, De Carvalho was a supper guest in the home of Rabbi Benjamin Friedman of Temple Society of Concord and Mrs. Friedman.

DIRECTOR MUNCH will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concert in the Theater-Concert Hall in Tanglewood and in addition to the two weeks of Shed concerts announced, also will conduct the final week of concerts. There is no change in announced plans for the Berkshire Choral, Chamber Music and Composition departments.

AARON COPLAND who has been in the American Academy in Rome for several months, will return in time for the School's opening exercises on July 1. Boris Goldovsky, head of the Opera department, will stage and conduct Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame" (The Queen of Spades). The opera, major production of the Opera Department, is based on the dramatic short story by Pushkin. Goldovsky was on leave of absence from the Department last summer. The School also will produce "Ariadne Auf Naxos" by Richard Strauss.

Berkshire Season Starts Early, Summer Guests Arriving Now

By Richard V. Happel –

PITTSFIELD, Mass.

The Berkshires are greeting summer guests well ahead of schedule, and several of the older summer hotels have already opened their doors. The Berkshire Playhouse plans an extra week of performances, youngsters are swimming in the lakes, and many of the golf courses report more than the usual number of players for so early in the year. There is also considerable activity around Tanglewood, the site of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, with many people driving up from the metropolitan centers to see the Shed and decide where they want their seats for the concerts by the Boston orchestra commencing on July 26.

The Berkshire Museum at Pittsfield has announced its sponsorship of the fifth annual Berkshire bus tours beginning July 28. These tours in specially chartered scenic buses will cover the entire Berkshire area on successive week ends and will be all-day affairs.

On alternate week ends the Pittsfield Polo Club holds fast games on Weston Field, which later in August will be the scene of the annual Pittsfield Riding Club Horse Show. This show generally attracts many important Eastern exhibitors.

For those of simpler tastes the Massachusetts Department of Forestry has readied its sixteen reservations for the picnicker and tourist. From the Hopkins Memorial Experimental Forest in the northwest corner of the state to the Mount Everett Reservation near Great Barrington, firewood, tables and cooking facilities are provided for those who care to prepare their meals in the open. Miles of woodland trails in these same areas provide the hiker with many hours of pleasure.

The Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival has announced the engagement of Antony Tudor to direct a permanent ballet company. Mr. Tudor will have a number of important soloists and will present several of his latest works. Ted Shawn, founder-director of the Pillow, has plans for a new original work based on the Old Testament "Song of Songs." The dance festival will open at Lee on June 29 with Nora Kaye and Hugh Laing in the ballet spots and La Meri will perform a number of her ethnic dances on the same program.

MUNCH TO OPEN MUSIC FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD

Boston Symphony Director To Take Over Assignments Of Dr. Koussevitzky

Boston, June 11 (AP)—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed engagements in Europe because of the death of Serge Koussevitzky and will return to the United States the first week of July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on July 7.

All Three Weeks

This was announced tonight at Symphony Hall. The announcements said Munch would conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series of concerts between July 7 and 22 originally assigned to Dr. Koussevitzky.

Before Dr. Koussevitzky's death altered the plans, Munch was to have made his Tanglewood debut conducting the first two weeks of concerts in the music shed July 26-Aug. 4. Dr. Koussevitzky was to have closed the shed concerts Aug. 9-12. Now Munch will conduct all three weeks.

The orchestra management announced that the Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky founded at Tanglewood, will continue with Leonard Bernstein returning from Mexico to take over the late conductor's work. Munch has invited Bernstein to conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The symphony said Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, would stage and conduct Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," which Dr. Koussevitzky had been scheduled to conduct.

Charles Mu... To Direct At Tanglewood

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European season and will return to America to conduct the opening Bach-Haydn-Mozart concert at Tanglewood July 7.

Mr. Munch has sent word that there will be a little change in the programs originally planned by Serge Koussevizky. The Berkshire Music Center, the school which the late Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, will continue, it was announced.

Munch will conduct all of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall and in addition to the two weeks of Shed concerts already announced will also conduct the final week of concerts. Eleanor de Carvalho will lead a concert Aug. 5 and Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" scheduled for Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" and the school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos." There will be no change in plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments of the school, it was announced. Aaron Copland, who has been at the American Academy at Rome this winter, will return for the school's opening exercises July 1.

MUNCH CUTS EUROPE TRIP

Will Return to U.S. in Early July to Open Berkshire Festival

Boston, June 11.—(AP)—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed engagements in Europe because of the death of Serge Koussevitzky and will return to the United States the first week of July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on July 7.

This was announced tonight at Symphony Hall. The announcement said Munch would conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series of concerts between July 7 and 22 originally assigned to Dr. Koussevitzky.

Women in Shorts Disturb Propriety of Tanglewood

By The Associated Press.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3—Tanglewood officials "prefer" that women wear skirts when they visit the scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's famous summer concerts.

More and more of them have been showing up recently in shorts or slacks. Today, ushers offered informally clad tourists wrap-around skirts for wear on the grounds.

Thomas B. Perry Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, said the wrap-arounds would "give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform—a skirt."

MUSIC FETE HONORS DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

'Missa Solemnis' Presented as Requiem at Tanglewood —8,000 Attend Program

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was to have been the chief work to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky at this year's Berkshire festival but because of his recent death it became a requiem mass in his honor, when it was presented at Tanglewood tonight.

The mass was conducted by Leonard Bernstein, one of Dr. Koussevitzky's protégé. Fittingly enough, it was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a chorus of 140 students of the Berkshire Music Center. To help ensure the success of the performance, Charles Munch, as a gesture to his predecessor, surrendered part of his own rehearsal time, for the preparation.

The mass was the only work on the program and it attracted an audience of 8,000. It was the largest Thursday audience of the season.

Despite the memorial nature of the occasion, the performance was not funereal. It hardly could be, considering the character of Beethoven's music. Mr. Bernstein made sure that the program was vigorous and alive.

"Kyrie," "Gloria" Exciting

Indeed, one wondered if perhaps he didn't try to make the "Kyrie," the "Gloria" and "Credo" so exciting that the audience could not restrain its applause in spite of the printed request that applause be omitted.

For one listener, the most beautiful and expressive parts of the performance were the three prevailingly quiet closing sections, "the Sanctus," "the Benedictus" and the "Agnus Dei." This, however, may have been partly due to a shift in hearing position.

Mr. Bernstein experimented by playing his four soloists in the back row of the chorus. They stood almost against the acoustical reflector and from up close they sounded rather colorless and insufficiently dominating. Following a report that they sounded better at the back, however, this reviewer moved there after the "Credo."

The report was well founded. From the rear, the voices of the soloists sounded clear, true and strong, sustaining the melodic lines in a way that upheld the whole work. Those soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Emma Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, all of whom have been students at one time or another at the Berkshire Music Center.

Events Set for Tomorrow

One can assume that, could he have heard the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky would have been touched and flattered. But perhaps his heart would have been even more gladdened by the series of events that is scheduled for tomorrow—the annual mustering of talent known as "Tanglewood on Parade."

Students of the departments of the center will show off for visitors in various smaller concerts and in the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be led alternately by Eleazar de Carvalho, Richard Burgin, Mr. Bernstein and Mr. Munch.

Mr. Bernstein will double as piano soloist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and during the intermission there will be a brief talk by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who collaborated with Dr. Koussevitzky last season as the narrator for "Peter and the Wolf." The event will close with the customary waltzing on the lawn, for it was one of the conductor's desires that what he helped create here should continue with its spirit unabated.

Linwood School Sets Season Faculty

LINWOOD Music School, Linwood, Livingston County, announces its faculty for the Summer session, with activities for various age-groups. Frieda Osborne, Livonia, again will teach piano for adults and children, and also will be in charge of the Introduction to Music class for 7-9 children and ear training and melodic dictation class for the group 9-12.

Children's Theater group will do creative work of their own, guided by Lorina Smith, York. From story-telling folksongs and ballads they will choose their favorites, dramatize and perform them at the closing school concert to accompaniment of a recorder ensemble.

Jack Smead, music and drama supervisor at Pavilion Central School, will direct a new venture, an Opera Workshop, meeting three evenings a week. This, for young people and adults, is expected in developing better acting in the York Opera Company, although membership is not required. Anyone over 16 is welcome.

NEGRO SOPRANO HONORED

Mary Robbs Wins Scholarship to Berkshire Festival

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn., June 15—Mary Robb, 23-year-old Negro soprano from this city, has received a scholarship to the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer, it was announced today by J. Oscar Miller, voice teacher at the Cadek Conservatory of Music.

Miss Robbs was auditioned recently by Hugh Ross, director of Schola Cantorum of New York, who made the scholarship recommendation. The young singer is now in New York, where she has made application to study at the Julliard School of Music in the fall. A special scholarship was created so that Miss Robbs could attend the Berkshire Festival.

When she applied, Mr. Ross said, the regular scholarships were filled, but it was decided that her performance was "quite extraordinary and so sincere that we could not afford not to have her."

Miss Robbs won her first major public recognition when the people of her home town last March heard her sing as a guest soloist with the Chattanooga Symphony Orchestra. This was believed to be the first instance in the south in which a Negro appeared in a public concert with an all-white orchestra.

Miss Roslind Lang, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. Lang of Hot Springs, formerly of Little Rock, is attending the Berkshire Music Center on a scholarship awarded at the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y. She is studying the violin and is in her senior year at Eastman.

She graciously consented to pose for a photograph for the Gazette, during the visit of the fashion editors to Tanglewood on July 15.

Miss Lang attended Centennial School and West Side Junior High in Little Rock before moving with her family to Hot Springs. She has always been interested in music and is studying orchestra and chamber music at the Center. She studied in Little Rock with Wilbur Shoemaker and Artur Ax, and has played with the Arkansas Symphony.

She has given numerous recitals and has appeared as soloist with the Rochester Civic Orchestra. She will play with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra next season, under the direction of Erich Leinsdorf.

She has three hours each day at the Berkshire Music Center in both orchestra and chamber music. She enjoys every minute of her Tanglewood stay, she says, because it's like a vacation. She expects to return to Arkansas August 12, for a visit with her parents in Hot Springs.

SHARING WORK AT FESTIVAL

Munch, Bernstein and Copland at Lenox

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein and composer Aaron Copland will, in their various ways, take over the duties of the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at Tanglewood this summer. The present music director of the Boston Symphony, who had planned to conduct the first five concerts of the Berkshire Festival proper, from Thursday, July 26, through Saturday evening, Aug. 4, will also conduct the two final concerts on Aug. 11 and 12.

Leonard Bernstein, who was to have had a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer, is returning from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting classes at the Berkshire Music Centre. As a memorial to Koussevitzky, he will conduct Thursday evening, Aug. 9, as the seventh concert of the festival, the scheduled performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, which was to have been directed by Koussevitzky. Eleazar de Carvalho still retains his concert of Sunday afternoon, Aug. 5. All program details will be announced later. As assistant director of the Music Center, Mr. Copeland, who is now at the American Academy in Rome, will assume the administrative duties of the school, whose activities will continue unchanged.

STAND REVERENTLY SILENT

Tanglewood Audience Hears Music In Honor Of The Late Koussevitsky

Lennox, Mass., July 28 (AP)—Instead of the customary applause some 6,000 persons stood reverently silent Thursday night when Charles Munch, Boston symphony orchestra conductor, concluded his first piece at opening of the Berkshire music festival.

The piece was Mozart's Masonic funeral music, played in honor of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the 77th anniversary of Koussevitzky's birth and the first time he missed the opening of the concerts at Tanglewood's shed since it became a center of music 13 seasons ago.

Munch asked the audience not to applaud and suggested that moment of silence be observed, instead.

Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed conductor who died last month, was in the box section of the big music shed during the first half of the program.

Boston Pops At Fenway July 11

BOSTON — For the first time the Boston Symphony forces are to move into Fenway park. On Wednesday evening, July 11th, under the active sponsorship of the city of Boston, Arthur Fiedler will direct the Boston Pops orchestra in a monster benefit for the Esplanade concerts. For the past 22 years these concerts have been given free for the general public. This summer, for this one night, admission will be charged to bolster the Esplanade concert fund.

Vice Chairman Michael T. Kelleher said, however, that "though the cause is appealing, the show is the thing. Fiedler's Fenway festival with many guests, including America's favorite composer, Richard Rodgers, will truly be some enchanted evening." A master of ceremonies from the show world, and famous soloists, are yet to be announced.

Recently Arthur Fiedler met with Joe Cronin at Fenway park, tested acoustics and made arrangements in which Fenway park and the city of Boston will participate to provide the necessary stage, lighting and amplification, and whatever is needed to give the audience full enjoyment from this gala benefit.

U. S. Tax on Symphony Tickets May Be Ended

By FRANCIS A. KLEIN

Cheering news has been received by the directors of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, who still face a deficit of some $40,000 but who are courageously going ahead with plans for a full-scale 1951-52 season.

The news was that the House Ways and Means Committee in Washington has given final approval to a bill exempting symphonies and other non-profit institutions from the 20 per cent federal admissions tax.

This is the climax of a year-long effort by the St. Louis orchestra and other similar groups throughout the country to get this tax removed. Those battling for the remission were swift to warn, however, that the fight is not yet won, and that renewed reminders to Representatives and Senators are needed to assure ultimate success.

The bill must now come before the House, where it can't be amended and where passage is regarded as certain. Then it goes to the Senate Finance Committee, which is expected to open hearings upon it early next month. If favorable action can be obtained here, then the measure, looked upon as a financial life-saver for struggling musical organizations all over the United States, will follow the usual legislative procedure until it becomes law.

APPEAL TO PUBLIC

Backers of the bill, here and elsewhere, are hopeful that this can be done by Steptember, in time to be of some help in relieving the monetary gloom and the rather bleak outlook for symphony groups in general. That's why they are urging a renewed campaign on the part of the public to bring to the attention of the legislators the vital need for this financial shot-in-the-arm for serious music.

As an illustration of what it means in St. Louis, here are a few figures: In the 1947-48 season, the federal admissions tax take from the Symphony was $56,667. The following season it was $44,490, and the next year $60,374. In each of those seasons, the Metropolitan Opera helped swell receipts, and, of course, tax revenues. Without the Met, in the 1950-51 season just past, the St. Louis Symphony paid $25,724 in admissions taxes. It's even worse in other cities. Boston's Symphony, for example, paid $150,000 last year, and a total of more than $1,000,000 since the tax was imposed in World War II.

In virtually every other country, the government not only does not tax symphony societies, but on the contrary it subsidizes them. Subsidies are not asked here; only relief from a tax which has become burdensome to the point of being unbearable.

The problem of deficits isn't peculiar to St. Louis by any means. At least 300 communities of varying size throughout the country each recognize the same acute dilemma in its symphony society. Audiences which attend the concerts represent a complete cross-section at every income level of those who enjoy music and who at the same time obtain its educational benefits. Relief from the tax burden would be of relatively greater benefit to the many smaller orchestral associations who

Directors of these groups haven't been idle and lazy and willing for Uncle Sam to do it all. They have tapped every source of additional revenue they could think of, including radio broadcasts, phonograph record royalties, motion pictures, program ads, and others. It's not enough. Pay rolls and maintenance costs have increased enormously and so have the deficits.

It can be asked: If symphonies are exempt from admission taxes, why not amusements, too? The question should anwer itself. Amusements are for profit; they are supported by a transient box office attraction which varies in appeal with the showmanship of the enterprise. The cultural concert, on the other hand, has to look for a year-to-year subscriber who takes up some of the slack for those who can afford to go only occasionally.

Symphony societies are, without dissent, the fount and mainspring of cultural life in America. This nation has taken world leadership in it, the only one of the many arts where it can claim that distinction. We can realize what that means when we look back a few years and remember that all such things carried a European label. Now millions of Americans, everywhere, profit by concerts given by 300 symphony orchestras. Those for children given at low or no cost, form an integral part of the musical education program of our schools. The orchestras are the source of the teaching staffs of our schools and colleges.

END OF RESOURCES

In all of this, the St. Louis Symphony Society, the second oldest in the nation, has played a leading part. For generations it has contributed generously to the cultural life not only of this community but also through its travels in many parts of the country. It has brought world-renowned artists here, and world-famed organizations, including the Metropolitan Opera, the Ballet Russe, Symphony of Fashio and many, many more.

Now, however, th St. Louis Symphony has reac the end of its resources. On of the truly great torches of cu ture in the city and in the natio will be ex-tinguished if it is f ced to dis-band. One of the g atest prides of the community wil be obliterat-ed if this is permitte to happen. This tax burden is h stening the end, and it's a most unhappy na-tion which lets its achieved cul-ture in music and a t go by the boards.

These are some of the reasons the Symphony direc rs here are urging the public an every music lover in particular to write his Representative and Senator urging repeal of the admissions tax. It can be a letter, or even a penny post card; just so you let those who serve you in Congress know how you feel about it.

MISSOURI'S LEGISLATORS

The United States Senators from Missouri are James P. Kem of Kansas City and Thomas C. Hennings Jr., of St. Louis. They may be reached in Washington, care of the Senate. The Missouri Representatives in Congress are Clare Magee, Unionville; Phil J. Welch, St. Joseph; Clarence Cannon, Elsberry; O. K. Armstrong, Springfield; Morgan Moulder, Camdenton; Paul C. Jones, Kennett; A. S. J. Carnahan, Ellsinor; Dewey Short, Galena; Leonard Irving, Independence; Richard Bolling, Kansas City; Thomas B. Curtis, Webster Groves; Frank M. Karsten, St. Louis; Claude I. Bakewell, St. Louis. They may be reached in Washington, care of the House of Representatives.

When the admissions tax repeal bill goes before the Senate Finance Committee, a symphony group will be on hand to urge its merits. This group consists of William Zalken, manager of the St. Louis Symphony; George E. Judd of the Boston Symphony; Arthur J. Gaines of the Minneapolis Symphony, and Mrs. Helen M. Thompson of Charleston, W. Va., executive secretary of the American Symphonic Orchestra League, which represents more than 600 semi-professional and amateur orchestras in the United States.

They should, with your help, be able to plead a very good case, one which will let us keep our symphony orchestra and permit it to go on to even higher achievements.

The Central City, Colo., Opera Festival begins June 30 in that mountain town 40 miles from Denver. Tibor Kozma, of the Metropolitan Opera, will be the musical director again this year and Elemer Nagy will be the general director.

The Plymouth Rock festival will begin June 29 and is planned for nine weeks which will be the longest season of its six-year history. It has scheduled four operas for the Duxbury theater in Duxbury, Mass., and the 17th century masque "The Fairy Queen" by Henry Purcell. A unique double-bill will be of Kurt Weil's "Down In the Valley" and the Gilbert and Sullivan opera. "Trial By Jury." Also included in the varied program will be a full production of Haydn's oratoria "Creation."

At Stowe, Mass., the Trapp family will be hosts as usual to al-comers between July 9 and Aug. 30. The Trapps have been having their summer "sing weeks" for eight years.

New York Active

New York's summer concerts will almost vie with the winter ones, for orchestral music at least. The "Pops" concert series of members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony open June 2 in Carnegie Hall. The Naumburg Symphony will play three times during the summer in Central Park. The Goldman Band will inaugurate its summer park concerts in Manhattan and Brooklyn June 15 and play 50 concerts in all. And there will be the famed stadium concerts.

Three conductors will share the podium of the NBC Symphony with Arturo Toscanini during the 1951-52 season. They are Guido Cantelli, Fritz Reiner and Charles Munch. The orchestra's 15th season will open Nov. 3, with Toscanini conducting.

The word in musical circles is that Toscanini probably will be able to conduct all the 13 concerts for which he is scheduled, despite the leg ailment which compelled teh venerable maestro to cut short this season. Cantelli is scheduled for eight concerts and Reiner and Munch will conduct one each.

Wednesday Nighters Arrange Outings For Near Future

The Wednesday Nighters, a YWCA co-ed group of young people, have completed their plans for summer outings and special trips. The group will meet June 27 at the Ann Street YWCA to go to Barkhamsted Reservoir and on July 11, will make a trip to Columbia Lake. A trip to Simsbury State Forest has been scheduled for July 18 and to Lake Compounce in Bristol, July 25. Other trips are to Highland Lake, Winsted, August 1 and to Cherry Park, August 29.

Sunday, June 24, the group are journeying to the Marine Museum at Mystic. On July 10 and July 24 they will witness pops concerts and will attend the Norwich Summer Theater, July 19. They also plan to attend the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, July 29 and August 12. On August 8 they will be present at the square dance festival at the University of Connecticut. The Wednesday Nighters will have its own dance set for this exhibition. For further details anyone interested may call the YWCA at 5-1163.

Boston Pops At Fenway July 11

BOSTON — For the first time the Boston Symphony forces are to move into Fenway park. On Wednesday evening, July 11th, under the active sponsorship of the city of Boston, Arthur Fiedler will direct the Boston Pops orchestra in a monster benefit for the Esplanade concerts. For the past 22 years these concerts have been given free for the general public. This summer, for this one night, admission will be charged to bolster the Esplanade concert fund.

Vice Chairman Michael T. Kelleher said, however, that "though the cause is appealing, the show is the thing. Fiedler's Fenway festival with many guests, including America's favorite composer, Richard Rodgers, will truly be some enchanted evening." A master of ceremonies from the show world, and famous soloists, are yet to be announced.

Recently Arthur Fiedler met with Joe Cronin at Fenway park, tested acoustics and made arrangements in which Fenway park and the city of Boston will participate to provide the necessary stage, lighting and amplification, and whatever is needed to give the audience full enjoyment from this gala benefit.

Deficit of $280,000 Reported in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's deficit during the past year was $280,000. Record royalties decreased by $60,000, broadcasting receipts were down $20,000 and Symphony Hall rentals were $15,000 less than usual.

Gifts of $80,000 reduced the deficit to $200,000, "which pretty much eliminated all our available reserves," according to Oliver Wolcott, chairman of the board. Wolcott said that had the government rescinded the admission taxes on orchestras the deficit would have been wiped out.

U. S. Tax on Symphony Tickets May Be Ended

By FRANCIS A. KLEIN

Cheering news has been received by the directors of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, who still face a deficit of some $40,000 but who are courageously going ahead with plans for a full-scale 1951-52 season.

The news was that the House Ways and Means Committee in [illegible] has given final ap-

Natural Beauty of Berkshire Hills Delights Tourists

Whatever the season, vacationists are lured to the natural beauties of the Berkshire Hills in western Massachusetts. The first vision of the unspoiled charm of the rolling hills is an unforgettable thrill.

Fine hotels, inns, camps, roadside cabins, ranches and guest homes are equipped to handle every social requirement and budget limitation.

Facilities for swimming, sailing, fishing, riding, golfing, hiking, tennis and many other spectator sports abound in this district.

The Berkshires offer 15 state forests and parks, each with its individual interest. An early morning horseback ride through mountain and valley scenery of unsurpassed beauty, along endless mountain trails and picturesque woodland will be a cherished memory. For golf enthusiasts, there are 18 beautiful courses.

For those whose interests are cultural, the famous Berkshire Music Festival is held each Summer. This year it will be held from July 2 to Aug. 12. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series of concerts in Tanglewood, most of them scheduled for the week-ends.

Well known stars of stage and screen appear at the Stockbridge Playhouse, where under the direction of William Miles the drama school stages productions from mid-June until September.

Nature lovers will find delight in the Pleasant Valley bird and wild flower sanctuary, Lenox; Bartholomews Cobble, Ashley Falls, or Greylock Memorial atop Mt. Greylock, highest point in the state.

The Mohawk Trail — North Adams to Greenfield; Taconic Trail—Pittsfield to Troy, N. Y.; Berkshire Trail — Pittsfield to Northampton; Skyline Trail, east from Hinsdale, and Knox Trail, east from Great Barrington, offer panoramic thrills of nature to the motorist. Good roads run through the entire area and several picnic grounds may be found along each trail.

Trout fishing extends through July 31, and the Framington, Konkapot, Clam, Buck, Green, Housatonic and Williams Rivers are among the Commonwealth's finest for trout fishing. Scores of smaller streams are well stocked. Black bass, pickerel and panfish are plentiful and the season extends through the Fall on all species save trout.

Massachusetts Hills And Beaches Beckon

By LENOX E. BIGELOW

Massachusetts' vacation and holiday resources are tailored to many needs. From the hundreds of beaches along an 1,800-mile coastline to the verdant rolling Berkshire Hills at its western extremity, the Bay State's many and varied recreational activities are easily accessible by good highways, by train, bus or airline.

Comfortable accommodations line its shore, offering salt water sport and opportunities for seclusion and relaxation. Hundreds of miles of beaches, ocean sport fishing, yachting and boating of every description, plus many evening diversions, may be enjoyed from Salisbury Beach, southward on the North Shore, the South Shore, Cape Cod, and Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket Islands.

Cape Cod and the islands offer ideal Summer weather with water temperatures of 60 to 70 degrees.

The greater Boston region has many historic landmarks and literary shrines, plus some of the country's great institutions of learning and culture. Add to this two major league baseball parks, running horse and greyhound race tracks, night clubs, famous eating places and outstanding entertainment attractions.

The Berkshire Hills and adjacent Pioneer Valley have charms equally attractive. Of international fame the Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox will be conducted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, beginning July 2 and extending through Aug. 12, with a series of concerts of works by the great masters as well as many other activities.

Fine golf courses extend guest privileges to visitors. Summer theaters are in every vacation region with repertory productions.

Facilities for camping and trailer sites are available in the State forests and parks, where also may be found hundreds of fireplace picnic sites, bridle and hiking trails, swimming and fishing.

The salt water sport fishing is tops for a variety of species. Ipswich Bay and Cape Cod waters swarm with giant and school tuna. Surfcasting or trolling for striped bass and bluefish is fine. White marlin and swordfish are found in increasing numbers in offshore waters south of Cape Cod, while ground fishing is good all along the coast.

Hospitable lodgings are available to fit every purse and social requirement.

Winthrop Sets Music Courses

ROCK HILL. — Two New York musicians rated high among American artists will conduct special courses at the Winthrop College summer school.

Dr. Edwin Hughes, pianist and composer, will conduct Winthrop's 19th annual master class in piano, a four-weeks course for advanced pianists.

Hugh Ross, choral and orchestra conductor, will direct a two-weeks choir and choral workshop, and conduct a 100-voice demonstration chorus.

BOTH COURSES will begin Monday with registration scheduled for 11 a.m. in the Winthrop administration building. Qualified applicants desiring to take either course for credit may be admitted through Wednesday.

A series of piano recitals by master class pupils and a two-piano concert by Dr. Hughes and his wife, Jewel Bethany Hughes, will highlight the master class. Dates will be announced later.

Climaxing the choral workshop, the demonstration chorus of 100 selected voices will appear in concert Sunday, June 24. The recitals and concerts will be open to the public.

Dr. Hughes, teaching piano in New York City for many years, has been associated with the Winthrop summer school since 1932. A composer and editor-arranger of pianomusic, he was formerly editor-in-chief for piano music of G. Schirmer Inc., noted publishing firm of New York.

Since his New York debut in 1917, Hughes has appeared as recitalist and soloist with orchestras in the principal music centers of America and Europe. In 1933 he and Mrs. Hughes gave the first White House musicale under the Roosevelt administration. For patriotic services as expert consultant on music during World War II, the War and Navy departments awarded him a citation in 1946.

HUGH ROSS, born in England, has directed the Schola Cantorum in New York since 1927. He is noted as an organist and pianist as well as a choral and orchestra conductor.

As assistant conductor to Maestro Arturo Toscanini, Ross presented the choral portions of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra concerts during 1929-34. He produced and conducted at the New York World's Fair a pageant of 1,000 singers, dancers and musicians.

Last summer Ross taught the first Winthrop choral workshop and conducted choral groups at the famous Tanglewood summer music festival, directed by the late Conductor Serge A. Koussevitzky. Ross has appeared as guest conductor with leading British and American orchestras.

Music

Music has this in common with hamburger sandwiches—it tastes even better outdoors than in, especially in the proper surroundings. Many a time we have gone to what a good many folks consider the stuffy confines of Carnegie Hall, in New York, to hear the Philharmonic, and, of course, have enjoyed it but we never enjoyed, for example, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony in Carnegie as much as we did hearing it in the Lewisohn Stadium, under the wide and starry sky, and with the traffic light over by City College blinking red and green at us, and even with the airplanes passing overhead. The same thing is true of the music of the Philadelphia Symphony when it plays during the Summer months in Robin Hood's Dell, or the Boston Symphony during its magnificent music festival up in the mountains. There is something about music and the open country which seems to fit. Handel's "Water Music" sounds a lot better played outdoors than indoors, and "Eine Kleine Nacht Muzik" sounds almost like another composition when played with the stars and the moon overhead, and the night wind blowing gently upon one.

Berkshire Music Festival Opens Season at Tanglewood Tomorrow

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will lift his baton in the theater music hall at Tanglewood, Lenox, tomorrow evening to open the 1951 series of Berkshire Symphonic festival concerts.

Tomorrow evening Dr. Munch will conduct the first of the six preliminary concerts by small groups of musicians from the Boston orchestra devoted to the works of Bach, Mozart and Haydn. They will be given on Saturday evenings at 8.15 o'clock and Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock in three successive week-ends. Then will follow the nine major festival concerts in the music shed by the full Boston orchestra on successive Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons.

Dr. Munch, in conducting the Bach-Mozart-Haydn series, will be taking over a duty which his predecessor in the Boston orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, had reserved for himself. Besides directing those six concerts Dr. Koussevitzky had planned also to conduct the final series of three major festival concerts and also to direct the Berkshire Music center which he founded nine years ago at Tanglewood. After his death, Dr. Munch cut short a European tour to return and take over the festival concerts Dr. Koussevitzky was to have conducted.

The program on Saturday evening will be devoted to Bach's works and will include the second, third, fourth and sixth Brandenburg concertos and the concerto for three pianos in C major. Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz will be the piano soloists. Sunday afternoon's Bach concert will open with the "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" cantata in which Hugh Ross will conduct the Berkshire Music center chorus, followed by three-piano concerto in D minor with Mr. Fine, Mr. Zighera and Mr. Berkowitz again serving as soloists, and the Magnificat in D.

Next week will be devoted to Haydn works and the following week-end to Mozart music.

Three Features Supplement Concert Association Program

The York County Concert association today announced that arrangements have been made to schedule Boris Goldovsky, the Metropolitan Opera broadcast commentator, for its coming season. With Goldovsky's unique personality, engaging sense of humor and rare virtuoso, his concert promises to be one of the highlights of the season. As a commentator, Mr. Goldovsky is in a class by himself, and not merely because of his charm of manner. He plays piece after piece during his concerts, tastefully and persuasively as you could wish. His little dabs of information add up to a portrait or a picture, and generally a very vivid one.

Miss Adele Addison, a young negro soprano, who in the few years since her graduation from Westminster Choir college in 1946 astonished the music world, is also to be included in what will be an exceptionally well-balanced program for the second season of the York County Concert association.

This past season Miss Addison sang three times as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston and at the Berkshire Music festival in Tanglewood, under the direction of three such eminent conductors as Koussevetsky, Charles Munch and Leonard Bernstein. This coming season, in addition to performances as soloist with orchestra and in opera, Miss Addison will appear in recitals on her first coast-to-coast tour. In three short years she has more than justified the opinion of the music critic of the Boston Herald when he first heard her in 1947: "She is potentially one of the greatest singers to appear so far in America—the name is Adele Addison, soprano. Mark it down."

The Berkshire Woodwind ensemble, members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will offer one of the most delightful concerts of the season. The ensemble includes the ute, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and French horn. Such concerts have become increasingly rare in chamber music and will be a joy tonally to hear. The Berkshire Woodwind ensemble plays with purity and with exceptional skill and will serve to refresh minds of the tonal beauty of a woodwind ensemble, a fact we are apt to forget because it is heard alone so rarely.

The brilliant two-piano team, Luboshut and Nemenoff, has been announced previously. A fifth concert will be announced as soon as final arrangements are made.

The general public may inquire about membership subscriptions by calling Mrs. George D. Love, 121 North street, Saco.

Dr. Koussevitzky Buried Near Beloved Tanglewood

By CYRUS DURGIN

LENOX, June 8—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was laid to final rest at 11:30 this morning in the little cemetery adjoining the Congregational Church on the Hill. His grave is on a velvety green southward slope, under the shade of a large maple tree, only a few miles from Tanglewood and his Summer home, Serenak, he loved so well.

Final services were conducted for the conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the church, and Bishop John, head of the Russian Orthodox Church in America who yesterday participated in the services at the Church of the Advent in Boston.

The contrast between this simple, brief service in Lenox and the color and pomp of the funeral in the Church of the Advent was considerable. In a way it symbolized in reverse the career of Dr. Koussevitzsky, who, born in obscurity and poverty in Tver, North Russia, 76 years ago, became a wealthy man and an artist known and admired the civilized world over.

Townsfolk in Tribute

The small white-clapboarded church, simply decorated and sunny, heated against the chill of morning by a single old-fashioned black stove, was nearly filled. Relatives and friends came from various places far away, and townsfolk who either had been associated in the multiple activities of the Tanglewood Festivals and the Berkshire Music Center, or simply had enjoyed the music Dr. Koussevitzky had made here for 14 Summers, were present.

As at the Boston services nearly 24 hours before, there was no eulogy. The nearest approach to sentiments praising the character and work of Dr. Koussevitzky were to be found in Rev. Mr. Owen's quotation of Walter Savage Landor's poem, "On Music," and in the clergyman's own poem, "My Tent Is Folded." Rev. Mr. Owen also read excerpts from an address on the relationship between church and music which Dr. Koussevitzky had delivered in 1944 at anniversary ceremonies of the Church on the Hill. The service began with the consoling words of the 121st, 103d and 23d Psalms.

When Rev. Mr. Owen finished, Bishop John, who had been seated with the Congregational clergyman on the flower-banked dais, walked slowly and with solemnity down the few steps to the mahogany casket, blanketed with white flowers and standing between lighted candles. In his low but musical voice the Bishop intoned the half-spoken, half-chanted Russian ritual for the dead.

This morning Bishop John wore not the flowing purple robe of yesterday's service at the Church of the Advent, but simple black headpiece and cassock, with a broad white and yellow stole. Rev. Mr. Owen was clad in black cassock with the orange and scarlet bordered hood of his divinity degree.

Wife Extinguishes Candle

The procession of mourners filed out of the church, down the granite steps, turning right to follow the graveled path a few yards westward to the open grave under the spreading maple tree. The morning was bright and sunny, if cool, the sky that wonderful soft blue and the vegetation that splendid green of the Berkshires in Spring. It was a comforting day for a home-coming.

At the grave, Bishop John intoned softly a last prayer, as the conductor's widow, Mrs. Olga Naumoff Koussevitzky, heavily veiled in black, stood with the two clergymen, a lighted candle in her hand. She knelt in a last prayer, the Bishop threw a small handful of Berkshire earth upon the casket, in symbol of the body's return to dust. Mrs. Koussevitzky likewise scattered a handful of earth, extinguished her candle, and the mortal form of Serge Koussevitzky was returned to the bosom of Nature whence he came.

The honorary bearers were Ruggi Berkowitz and T. F. Perry of the Berkshire Music Center; Louis Speyer and James Stagliano of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Dr. Forsley, Koussevitzky's physician in Lenox; Lester Roberts and Jay Rosenfeld, music critic of the Berkshire Eagle.

Festival To Be As He Planned

Mrs. Koussevitzky and the funeral party accompanying the body from Boston arrived in Lenox last evening, going directly to the Church on the Hill where the casket remained during the night. The casket was not opened. She spent the night at the Koussevitzky Summer home, Serenak, which nestles high in the hills overlooking Tanglewood, and where she and Dr. Koussevitzky had been married by Rev. Mr. Owen in August, 1947. She again went to Serenak following the services.

Among mourners at the services were Canon Anson Phelps Stokes of the Episcopal Church, Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, Conductor Leonard Bernstein, Harold Spivacke of the music division of the Library of Congress, Mrs. Jane Thaw, Dr. Ruth Anshen Brodsky, the writer; Betty Bean, vice-president of the music publishing firm of Boosey and Hawkes, Dr. Margaret Grant of the U.N., Composer Arthur Lourie and Michael Kachouk, Koussevitzky's manager.

It is said that the Berkshire Festival this summer will follow Koussevitzky's planned outline and carry out his expressed wishes for the program which he had formulated. Tchaikovsky's opera "Pique Dame," which Dr. Koussevitzky was to have conducted, will be presented as a memorial to him.

CASKET OF SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY descends into earth on grounds of Church on the Hill, Lenox, only a few miles from Tanglewood where he formed the famed Berkshire Music Center.

Oceans of Honor

Serge Koussevitzky stopped the Boston Symphony Orchestra during a rehearsal one day—as was his custom—and he said: "Gentlemen, I want that you should give mé an ocean of sound."

Although the ocean of sound that was the living music of Serge Koussevitzky is now stilled forever, the memory and the works of this Russian-born genius are permanently established in the hearts and minds of musical people the world over.

His achievements were no less than immense. It was his vision to re-create in "oceans of sound" the music of the masters and, unlike Toscanini, who may have overshadowed him in international reputation, he was without limitations: his boundless musical capacity made it possible for him to traverse with conviction and authority the music of every age, nation, race, school and style.

To do this, however, he had to have a great instrument, and he fashioned the Boston Symphony Orchestra into a musical ensemble of unparalleled sensitivity and virtuosity. For 25 years, as the reputation of the Boston orchestra grew, he worked with unimaginable vigor, driving himself harder than he ever drove his men to polish, to refine, to make ever more brilliant and responsive the great instrument at his disposal.

This, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the outward sign of his genius. There was, however, much more. For only history can tell what he did for contemporary music in commissioning, publishing, performing and repeating the works of living musicians. "There must be new music if there is to be old music," he said, and he played it, no matter what the criticism. If he had particular faith in it, as he had for Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, he repeated it again and again regardless of its reception. "It will live," he would say with great confidence—and he was right.

His influence on the making of artistic symphonic programs was enormous. For him the era of slight overtures, Bach transcriptions and musical popsicles in general was over. He developed the unique seating arrangement of the orchestra and created the famous "Koussevitzky" tone combining incandescent radiance with extraordinary urgency. More than this, in creating the Tanglewood Festival and later the Berkshire Music Center with all their diverse concert and student activities, he began a tradition that is already spreading its influence around the western world. And in founding the great Koussevitzky Musical Foundation in memory of his wife, Natalie, he guaranteed the perpetuation of commissions and grants to deserving composers and musicians.

This was, in all too brief form, his work. But Boston in particular owes him a debt of gratitude it can never pay. For, in a day when Boston had lost its right to be called the Athens of America, when Boston was the scapegoat for jokes about censors, jail-bird mayors and multi-million-dollar robberies, one thing remained beyond reproach, acclaimed and envied the world over. This was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With it Serge Koussevitzky not only produced oceans of sound for Boston, but oceans of honor. Today, as he lies at last in the green hills of the Berkshires in a foster land he loved with all the fierce devotion he had for music, we pause to honor him.

Central City Festival—

Dynamic Center of Music Attracts Growing Interest

By Miles Kastendieck

Central City, Colo.

What the Berkshire Festival is to the East, the Central City Festival must be to the West.

Up here, 8,500 feet above sea level and 40 miles west of Denver, the Central City Opera House Association has created a dynamic center of music and drama during July and August which apparently grows in drawing power every year. For Variety in Your Vacation Visit Historic Massachusetts

Islands of Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard Big Attractions for Visitors

Whatever you seek in whatever length of time you have for your vacation this year, the areas surrounding Boston are certain to fulfill your desires. Here in compact array are chapters from the last 300 years of American History.

Shadows of the most modern skyscrapers, department stores and hotels fall across landmarks of the nation's earliest days. In the immediate vicinity too, stand some 200 colleges and universities, establishing the section as one of the world's cultural meccas.

Concord, Lexington, Salem, Marblehead, Gloucester, Plymouth, Quincy, Sudbury—a roll call of America's literary and historic shrines is but a short drive from Boston proper. In the city itself, the Swan Boats float leisurely around the Frog Pond in the Public Garden. Music of the masters is played on the Charles River Esplanade by some of the world's finest musicians on summer evenings.

Boston's sky line can be seen from the small craft that sail along the Charles from the foot of Beacon Hill to the shores of the Harvard campus. Beacon Hill itself, Faneuil Hall, King's Chapel, Old North Church, several early burial grounds—each tell a vivid tale in the story of our country's history—the Boston Fish Pier, T-Wharf, fishing trawlers and ocean liners, sea-food and artists' studios, all are rich in American lore.

Across the Charles lies Cambridge, seat of Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Radcliffe College. Along Brattle Street stand stately residences known in earlier days as "Tory Row," and at the foot of the street is the "Cemetery of Poets" containing the graves of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Phillips Brooks.

No visitor should miss Wayside Inn at Sudbury, restored by Henry Ford, with the Little Red School House, the blacksmith's shop and the old grist mill which still makes waterground grain. Delicious meals may be obtained at the Inn, known in bygone days as Red Horse Tavern.

On Boston's North Shore there is yachting at Marblehead, colonial pastorals at Swampscott and Nahant, the Witch House and the House of Seven Gables at Salem. To the South of Boston, Quincy, the home of the President Adams; Hingham, Cohasset and Scituate radiate New England charm. The entire landscape from Boston to Cape Cod is dotted with restaurants, inns and taverns. Accommodations are plentiful, ranged in prices to meet every vacationer's budget.

FLAWWLESS BEACHES

A short ferry trip off southeastern Massachusetts lie the islands of Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket. The ferry will transport your auto. Both islands have airline connections with Boston.

The islands are treasures of a bygone era. All the adventurous atmosphere of the whaling era is retained amid sand dunes, cobblestone streets, green fairways and multi-colored gardens. Guest homes and fine hotels are plentiful, operating on both American and European plans.

Hardest thing to find on Martha's Vineyard is a dull moment. Flawless beaches are everywhere in a setting of golden sunshine, white sails and blue skies.

Summer theaters boast casts with topflight Broadway and Hollywood stars. There is dancing to the leading orchestras nightly. Antique shops on the island are known far and wide, and browsing through well-stocked shops is encouraged.

The 100 square mile triangle of the Vineyard has six towns, all connected by smooth state roads. Commercial center is Vineyard Haven; Oak Bluffs, the amusement and carnival area; and Edgartown, the residential section.

Cycling is the most popular means of transportation for both young and old. Three golf courses, two yacht clubs, excellent saddle horses, and fine tennis courts are available. Surf bathing in waters warmed by the Gulf Stream is unsurpassed. Fishing in still lagoons and inland ponds, or battling swordfish and tuna far from shore round out the summer sports.

Gay Head on the southern tip of the island has 200 foot cliffs that drop to the sea from a storm-weathered lighthouse, presenting a picture of natural beauty. Here dwell the remaining members of the Wampanoag Indian Tribe.

Nantucket is a mecca of world charm and Romance. Redolent with atmosphere of swashbuckling days of whalers, the island has one of the world's finest whaling museums. It is housed in a former whale oil and candle factory. In it is preserved an invaluable collection of ship's logs, covered whalebone and other objects of the industry.

Weather worn wharfs are still peopled with old-timers who tell tales of the days of "iron men and wooden ships. The homes of these early seafarers will forever intrigue and excite the visitor. Stately mansions border tree shaded streets. The "widow's walks" along the roofs tell of seamen's wives awatching for their husbands' return. These mansions have stood for hundreds of years, built with profits from the sale of sperm oil.

Whatever the season, vacationists are lured to the natural beauties of the Berkshire Hills in western Massachusetts. The first vision of the unspoiled charm of the rolling hills is an unforgettable thrill.

Fine hotels, inns, camps, roadside cabins, ranches and guest homes are equipped to handle every social requirement and budget limitation.

Facilities for swimming, sailing, fishing, riding, golfing, hiking, tennis and many other spectator sports abound in this district.

The Berkshires offer 15 State Forests and Parks, each with its individual interest. An early morning horseback ride through mountain and valley scenes of unsurpassed beauty, along endless mountain trails and picnic spots in woodland will be a cherished memory. For golf enthusiasts there are 18 beautiful courses.

For those whose interests are cultural the famous Berkshire Music Festival is held each summer. This year it will be held under the direction of [illegible] Munch from July 2 to Aug. 12. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series of concerts in Tanglewood, most of them scheduled for the weekends.

Well known stars of stage and screen appear at the Stockbridge Playhouse where, under the direction of William Miles, the drama school stages productions from mid-June until September.

Nature lovers will find [illegible] in the Pleasant Valley Bird and Wild Flower Sanctuary, Lenox, Bartholomew's Cobble, Ashley Falls, or Greylock Memorial at Mt. Greylock highest point in the state.

Cultural Clam Bake

Musicians, Artists, Writers on Loose At Resort Centers for Vacation Season

By DON SHORT

CULTURE (pronounced "kultshuh") is again being hammered into the touseled little heads of America's sleepy vacationists, who actually want nothing more than a chance to doze in some bosky dell and forget about the world of telephone bells and typewriters and nasty looks from the boss.

Neverthless, you are going to be exposed to something enlightening and educational—perhaps even artistic (who knows?) — no matter where your wanderlusting footsteps take you this Summer. The long-hairs have been messing around with the fun program again. They are going to see to it that you do not waste those two or three precious weeks on the silly business of just having a good time. You are going to be uplifted and enlightened and they are NOT talking about brassieres and light bulbs.

The omnipresent Associated Press has come up with a round-up of cultural activities associated with vacations. The list is overpowering.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which annually conducts a music lovers' stampede at a place called Tanglewood in the beautiful Berkshires of Massachusetts, will be throwing opera to the Summer winds this year. The sharp and flat fans are also expected to study during the Tanglewood Festival and there will be a special course for music teachers, as well as plenty of brain exercise for students. The whole business is scheduled for July 7 to August 12.

Terpsichore will also return to its natural element, the open fields and daisy-dotted dales, with the Jacob's Pillow dance festival in Becket. Oddly, this one, too, is in the balmy Berkshires. Among the leapers and lopers who will be expressing themselves between the dates of July 2 and Sept. 2 will be Ted Shawn and Ruth St. Denis. Whether you want to dance or not, the thing ought to make some pretty good snapshot material.

Marlboro College in Vermont has slated a plush sort of thing to which only "very advanced" musicians need apply. The dates are July 1 to Aug. 18. I was terribly impressed upon learning that director of the course is Rudolf Serkin, a pianist, who will be assisted by old violin recital partner, Adolf Busch. It seemed, at first glance, to be a nice arrangement; the piano-player bringing in his old violin recital partner to share in the Summer swag. One might imagine Harry Truman, at some distant date, conducting the course at Marlboro and bringing in Harry Vaughn to run the cash register or count the deep freezes or something. Then I learned that brother Busch is brother Serkin's father-in-law and all my dreams vanished.

You will be delighted to know, I am sure, that good old Marlboro (no relation to any cigarette) will also have the Moyse Trio on hand this Summer. This also on the authority of the Associated Press. Marcel Moyse is described as one of the world's greatest flute players. I never knew they rated things like that on an Olympic scale, but there he is and you've got to take Marcel whether he sounds like a permanent wave or not.

Marcel's son, Louis, is a pianist and Mrs. Louis Moyse is the former Blance Honegger! There! The cat is out of the bag and I hope you are flabbergasted. That is the way the AP played it and they furnished the information that she is the niece of a French composer and will teach violin and viola at Marlboro.

Last Summer, reports the AP, the music school at Marlboro had a Bach festival and there will probably be a series of public concerts this season. Wagging a figurative finger, good old AP quoted a Marlboro College official as saying,, "Musicians can't possibly get together wtihout giving concerts."

Marlboro will also sponsor a fiction writers' conference, Aug. 19 to Sept. 1. Your ticket of admission will be a manuscript. Anyone desiring an admission ticket may contact this leaning tower of wanderlust wisdom. I got a couple hundred of the things kicking around and none of them will ever see the light of day unless someone uses them as a ticket to get into Marlboro.

That ought to be enough to give you the general idea. Middlebury College, in the pine-pinged Green Mountains, where they have the most wonderful hiking and riding trails in the world and the best waffles and sausage and maple syrup, is going to stage a Writers' Conference, Aug. 15 to 29; the Trapp Family is determined to put on its series of "Sing Weeks" again at Stowe on Mount Mansfield and the art colonies at Provincetown and Cape Ann will be slopping paint all over God's green landscape.

Yes, brothers and sisters, it is going to be a highly educational Summer even if some of us take a day or two out for amusement. We are going to be cultured like a bottle of acidopholis milk and to some of us dopes who have always thought that a vacation was just a slight chance to wander off the reservation, it is going to be a unique experience.

Across the Charles lies Cambridge, seat of Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Radcliffe College. Along Brattle Street stand stately residences known in earlier days as "Tory Row," and at the foot of the street is the "Cemetery of Poets" containing the graves of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Phillips Brooks.

No visitor should miss Wayside Inn at Sudbury, restored by Henry Ford, with the Little Red School House, the blacksmith's shop and the old grist mill which still makes waterground grain. Delicious meals may be obtained at the Inn, known in bygone days as Red Horse Tavern.

On Boston's North Shore there is yachting at Marblehead, colonial pastorals at Swampscott and Nahant, the Witch House and the House of Seven Gables at Salem. To the South of Boston, Quincy, the home of the President Adams; Hingham, Cohasset and Scituate radiate New England charm. The entire landscape from Boston to Cape Cod is dotted with restaurants, inns and taverns. Accommodations are plentiful, ranged in prices to meet every vacationer's budget.

FLAWLESS BEACHES

A short ferry trip off southeastern Massachusetts lie the islands of Martha's Vineyard and Nantucket. The ferry will transport your auto. Both islands have airline connections with Boston.

The islands are treasures of a bygone era. All the adventurous atmosphere of the whaling era is retained amid sand dunes, cobblestone streets, green fairways and multi-colored gardens. Guest homes and fine hotels are plentiful, operating on both American and European plans.

Hardest thing to find on Martha's Vineyard is a dull moment. Flawless beaches are everywhere in a setting of golden sunshine, white sails and blue skies.

Summer theaters boast casts with topflight Broadway and Hollywood stars. There is dancing to the leading orchestras nightly. Antique shops on the island are known far and wide, and browsing through well-stocked shops is encouraged.

The 100 square mile triangle of the Vineyard has six towns, all connected by smooth state roads. Commercial center is Vineyard Haven; Oak Bluffs, the amusement and carnival area; and Edgartown, the residential section.

Cycling is the most popular means of transportation for both young and old. Three golf courses, two yacht clubs, excellent saddle horses and fine tennis courts are available. Surf bathing in waters warmed by the Gulf Stream is unsurpassed. Fishing in still lagoons and inland ponds, or battling swordfish and tuna far from shore round out the summer sports.

Gay Head on the southern tip of the island has 200 foot cliffs that drop to the sea from a storm-weathered lighthouse, presenting a picture of natural beauty. Here dwell the remaining members of the Wampanoag Indian Tribe.

Nantucket is a mecca of old world charm and Romance. Redolent with atmosphere of the swashbuckling days of the whalers, the island has one of the world's finest whaling museums. It is housed in a former whale oil and candle factory. In it is preserved an invaluable collection of ship's logs, covered whalebone and other objects of the industry.

Weather worn wharfs are still peopled with old-timers who tell tales of the days of "iron men and wooden ships. The homes of these early seafarers will forever intrigue and excite the visitor. Stately mansions border tree shaded streets. The "widow's walks" along the roofs tell of seamen's wives awatching for their husbands' return. These mansions have stood for hundreds of years, built with profits from the sale of sperm oil.

Whatever the season, vacationists are lured to the natural beauties of the Berkshire Hills in western Massachusetts. The first vision of the unspoiled charm of the rolling hills is an unforgettable thrill.

Fine hotels, inns, camps, roadside cabins, ranches and guest homes are equipped to handle every social requirement and budget limitation.

Facilities for swimming, sailing, fishing, riding, golfing, hiking, tennis and many other spectator sports abound in this district.

The Berkshires offer 15 State Forests and Parks, each with its individual interest. An early morning horseback ride through mountain and valley scenes of unsurpassed beauty, along endless mountain trails and paths, through woodland will be a cherished memory. For golf enthusiasts there are 18 beautiful courses.

For those whose interests are cultural the famous Berkshire Music Festival is held each summer. This year it will be held under the direction of Charles Munch from July 2 to Aug. 12. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series of concerts in Tanglewood, most of them scheduled for the weekends.

Well known stars of stage and screen appear at the Stockbridge Playhouse where, under the direction of William Miles, the drama school stages productions from mid-June into September.

Nature lovers will find a haven in the Pleasant Valley Bird and Wild Flower Sanctuary, Lenox; Bartholomew's Cobble, Ashley Falls, or Greylock Memorial and Mt. Greylock Reservation, highest point in the state.

Cultural Clam Bake -:- Musicians, Artists, Writers on Loose At Resort Centers for Vacation Season

By DON SHORT

CULTURE (pronounced "kultshuh") is again being hammered into the touseled little heads of America's sleepy vacationists, who actually want nothing more than a chance to doze in some bosky dell and forget about the world of telephone bells and typewriters and nasty looks from the boss.

Neverthless, you are going to be exposed to something enlightening and educational—perhaps even artistic (who knows?) — no matter where your wanderlusting footsteps take you this Summer. The long-hairs have been messing around with the fun program again. They are going to see to it that you do not waste those two or three precious weeks on the silly business of just having a good time. You are going to be uplifted and enlightened and they are NOT talking about brassieres and light bulbs.

The omnipresent Associated Press has come up with a round-up of cultural activities associated with vacations. The list is overpowering.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which annually conducts a music lovers' stampede at a place called Tanglewood in the beautiful Berkshires of Massachusetts, will be throwing opera to the Summer winds this year. The sharp and flat fans are also expected to study during the Tanglewood Festival and there will be a special course for music teachers, as well as plenty of brain exercise for students. The whole business is scheduled for July 7 to August 12.

Terpsichore will also return to its natural element, the open fields and daisy-dotted dales, with the Jacob's Pillow dance festival in Becket. Oddly, this one, too, is in the balmy Berkshires. Among the leapers and lopers who will be expressing themselves between the dates of July 2 and Sept. 2 will be Ted Shawn and Ruth St. Denis. Whether you want to dance or not, the thing ought to make some pretty good snapshot material.

Marlboro College in Vermont has slated a plush sort of thing to which only "very advanced" musicians need apply. The dates are July 1 to Aug. 18. I was terribly impressed upon learning that director of the course is Rudolf Serkin, a pianist, who will be assisted by old violin recital partner, Adolf Busch. It seemed, at first glance, to be a nice arrangement; the piano-player bringing in his old violin recital partner to share in the Summer swag. One might imagine Harry Truman, at some distant date, conducting the course at Marlboro and bringing in Harry Vaughn to run the cash register or count the deep freezes or something. Then I learned that brother Busch is brother Serkin's father-in-law and all my dreams vanished.

You will be delighted to know, I am sure, that good old Marlboro (no relation to any cigarette) will also have the Moyse Trio on hand this Summer. This also on the authority of the Associated Press. Marcel Moyse is described as one of the world's greatest flute players. I never knew they rated things like that on an Olympic scale, but there he is and you've got to take Marcel whether he sounds like a permanent wave or not.

Marcel's son, Louis, is a pianist and Mrs. Louis Moyse is the former Blanche Honegger! There! The cat is out of the bag and I hope you are flabbergasted. That is the way the AP played it and they furnished the information that she is the niece of a French composer and will teach violin and viola at Marlboro.

Last Summer, reports the AP, the music school at Marlboro had a Bach festival and there will probably be a series of public concerts this season. Wagging a figurative finger, good old AP quoted a Marlboro College official as saying,. "Musicians can't possibly get together without giving concerts."

Marlboro will also sponsor a fiction writers' conference, Aug. 19 to Sept. 1. Your ticket of admission will be a manuscript. Anyone desiring an admission ticket may contact this leaning tower of wanderlust wisdom. I got a couple hundred of the things kicking around and none of them will ever see the light of day unless someone uses them as a ticket to get into Marlboro.

That ought to be enough to give you the general idea. Middlebury College, in the pine-pinged Green Mountains, where they have the most wonderful hiking and riding trails in the world and the best waffles and sausage and maple syrup, is going to stage a Writers' Conference, Aug. 15 to 29; the Trapp Family is determined to put on its series of "Sing Weeks" again at Stowe on Mount Mansfield and the art colonies at Provincetown and Cape Ann will be slopping paint all over God's green landscape.

Yes, brothers and sisters, it is going to be a highly educational Summer even if some of us take a day or two out for amusement. We are going to be cultured like a bottle of acidopholis milk and to some of us dopes who have always thought that a vacation was just a slight chance to wander off the reservation, it is going to be a unique experience.

Serious Problem: How To Replace Serge Koussevitzky?

BY ANN HOLMES
Fine Arts Editor

The recent death of Serge Kroussevitzky, the late great conductor of the Boston Symphony, brings home to us a powerful fact: the number of truly magnetic podium masters is decreasing.

HOLMES

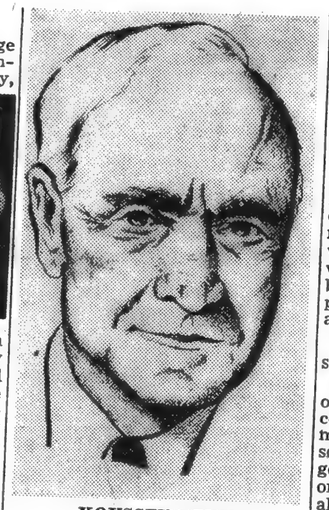
The Houston Symphony management especially has found this to be true. Serge Koussevitzky had been booked as a guest of the Houston Symphony next January 14. Many Houston people had purchased tickets for the series in which he was to appear, partly if not entirely because of the opportunity to hear and see such a distinguished master at work.

The management has announced that it will do everything within its power to replace Koussevitzky as faithfully as possible.

It is becoming rapidly clear that Koussevitzky is not precisely replaceable. The orchestra, to be sure, has several great men under consideration, and the problems of securing them for Houston when bookings have been made months ago are being solved. Subscribers to the symphony's series will not be let down; they will hear great music interpreted for them by a distinguished baton artist.

But it is of special interest just now to think about what Koussevitzky brought to his performances and—as a matter of greater interest — what he brought to the music of America.

The life of Koussevitzky was divided into three distinct periods: the Russian; the French; and the American, which has been highlighted by his 25 years as conductor of the renowned Boston Symphony.



KOUSSEVITZKY
A radiant spark

In each of these periods, the story was the same. Koussevitzky used his powers to promote the development of new composers and new music, without infringing upon the standard repertoire.

Scriabin, Debussy, Stravinsky, Honneger, Prokofiev, Roger Sessions, Aaron Copland, Frederick Converse, Roy Harris and many others could thank Koussevitzky for his efforts in promoting their interests.

But Koussevitzky himself was a man to reckon with. From the time he was seven years old he was determined to be a conductor. He reached the goal via successful performances on the bull fiddle. Indeed he was recognized as a world master of that bulky instrument.

That same determination bred in Koussevitzky a sense of discipline which he employed throughout his entire musical career, especially as a conductor. He would not tolerate mediocrity.

Even with this sense of discipline, proportion, and analysis Koussevitzky was, personally, a very beloved man. His fatherly interest in many musicians has often come to light. And in his music, too, Koussevitzky was one who felt that emotion in music was perfectly acceptable. He thus brought the balance of technical precision, intellectual analysis, and humanity to his work.

This is something that can be said of a few other conductors.

But add to this Koussevitzky's own personal magnetism, the colorful and rhythmic picture he made on the podium with his sense of beauty in conductorial gestures and his immaculate tailoring. He was a colorful personality too, as he appeared at rehearsals draped in his favorite cape. He'd shed it promptly however and attempt in his broken English to tell his musicians how to play. "Sing it, always let your music sing," he'd urge them.

Koussevitzky is gone, but what he had to say is long to be felt in the music of his many proteges. And while some of these able young men will mature into splendid musicians on their own, few will be able to transmit the spark that Koussevitzky himself brought to his music.

With the death of Koussevitzky, like that of Bernhardt, Shaw and others of the grand period of personal dynamism among our public personalities, the world loses another brilliant figure. But one of the greatest things a man could do in a lifetime, Koussevitzky did. He built a strong bridge from one epoch to another, and endowed the second epoch heavily.

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

THAT the music world is the poorer because of Serge Koussevitzy's death there is no question. At 76 he was still a dynamic force. Until his final illness he was hard at work on Tchaikowsky's opera "Pique Dame" scheduled for a Tanglewood performance this Summer. The occasion would have been his debut as an opera conductor in this country.

Whatever his achievement as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 25 years—and it was a great achievement—his significant contribution was his espousal of the contemporary composer. Ever leading the vanguard of new music, he did more for him than any other conductor during his quarter-century stewardship. It would be difficult to say whether the composers or the public are more greatly indebted to him for his contemporaneity.

That interest in something new blended constantly with something old. If his programs tended to reiterate the familiar, they nevertheless reflected the same pursuit of an ideal of perfection. Bringing the Boston Symphony to the height of refinement was only another facet of that burning zeal which sparked his whole life.

IN CHAMPIONING Sibelius and Stravinsky, then Prokofieff and Shostakovitch, he recognized the full current of European expression. His absorption in the Russian school did not deter him, however, from giving many young American composers their real impetus through premieres of their works. No other conductor has ever ventured to sponsor two complete American programs in one weekend in this city. Koussevitzky did it twice.

Yet closest to his heart was his work at Tanklewood. To him the music center there was the realization of his most cherished dream. Its success and the resplendant success of the Berkshire Festival may well remain a living monument to him.

This adopted American served his country nobly. That he made the most of his talents should be an inspiration to all.

Endowment for Center

To the Editor of THE EAGLE —

I concur heartily with every word which was expressed so ably by Miss Olive Colton on July 30.

However, I should like to go one step further and suggest that a separate Koussevitzky memorial fund should be raised to form an endowment to the Berkshire Music Center, and that this fund should be placed in a foundation to be administered according to the wishes of Mme. Koussevitzky and those of the present able directors of the Music School, so as to ensure that the ideals and aims of the great maestro may continue to be carried out in the spirit in which they were conceived.

KOUSSEVITZKY BURIED NEAR TANGLEWOOD

LENOX, June 8—Serge Koussevitzky was laid to rest today in the place he himself had chosen for his burial—beneath the shade of a large red maple tree in the beautiful Church of the Hill Cemetery here.

After simple services at the historic church, in which a Congregational minister and a Russian Orthodox bishop participated, the body of the famous maestro was lowered into its grave in the last available lot in the cemetery, which dates to 1776. The cemetery is near the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, which Dr. Koussevitzky directed.

CHURCH FILLED

Several hundred close friends of the world-famous conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled the little church for the services conducted by the minister, the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, who had officiated at Dr. Koussevitzky's marriage in 1947, and Bishop John of the Russian Orthodox church.

The Congregational clergyman opened with a reading of the 121st Psalm—"I will lift mine eyes unto the hills"—and the 23rd Psalm—"The Lord is My Shepherd." He then quoted from "Music," a poem by Walter Savage Landor, and from an address by Dr. Koussevitzky delivered from the same pulpit on the occasion of the 175th anniversary of the founding of the congregation.

At that time, Dr. Koussevitzky had said that music at all times was closely related to religion, and that through the church music had come to some of its finest fruition. To prove his point he cited Bach's D Minor Mass and Mozart's Requiem. Music, he said, had "full right to be called the Christian art."

The minister closed with a verse of his own, which he dedicated to Dr. Koussevitzky. It began: "My tent is folded, my prayer is done."

RUSSIAN SERVICE

Then Bishop John, who had been in the pulpit with the minister, descended to the body of the church and intoned the Russian service. At the grave the Russian Orthodox bishop also read the brief committal service.

At the graveside Mrs. Koussevitzky, who was attended by the young composer Leonard Bernstein, her husband's protege, held a single lighted taper as the service went on. At its conclusion she bent forward to drop a wreath on the casket and extinguished the taper. She then received the bishop's blessing and kissed his ring.

The body was brought here last night in a three-car motorcade following joint Episcopal and Russian Orthodox services at the Church of hte Advent, Boston. Because of the late hour of arrival plans for havin_ the body lie in state were abandoned.

Among those attending the services were Mr. and Mrs. Olin Downes, William Kroll, composer; Harold Spevake of the Library of Congress, Dr. Margaret Grant of the United Nations, Miss Betty Bean of New York, Canon and Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes, Arthur Laurier, composer, and many others.

KOUSSEVITZKY BURIED UNDER LENOX RED MAPLE

LENOX (AP) — Serge Koussevitzky was buried today in the shade of a red maple tree—a spot he had picked out himself before he died Monday night at the age of 76. The grave is in the Church of te Hill cemetery, not far from the Berkshire Music Center which the world famous conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony orchestra directed. A brief Congregational service preceded the burial with the Rev. J. Herbert Owen, who united Koussevitzky and his second wife in 1947, officiating.

Koussevitzky Death Shocks Many Friends Here

The recent death of Serge Koussevitzky came as a shock to all lovers of symphonic music and particularly to those of us here in the East where past years provided us a close contact with him and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His 25 year reign over the orchestra will ever remain as one of the most significant eras in the history of the Boston Symphony.

As a Bostonian, who was more or less initiated into the beauties of symphonic music at the Friday afternoon concerts during the conductor's early years with the orchestra, I feel something of a personal loss in his passing. It was my good fortune to be present at the concluding Berkshire Festival concert which he conducted last Summer though little did I think that it would be the last time I would see him.

Dr. Koussevitzky's death has necessitated a change in plans for this year's Festival concerts. Charles Munch, the present conductor of the Boston Orchestra, is curtailing his current European concert schedule and will return to this country early next month to open the Festival concerts on July 7. He will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart programs in the Theater Concert Hall and in addition to the two weeks of Shed concerts which he was already scheduled to direct, he will assume charge of the final week of concerts.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky founded at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with previous plans. Leonard Bernstein, a protege of the late conductor and a close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this year. At the invitation of Mr. Munch, Mr. Bernstein will also conduct the scheduled performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on Thursday evening, August 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Munch has sent word that there will be a minimum of change in the programs originally planned by the late conductor.

KOUSSEVITZKY

Serge Koussevitzky is dead! He died at 77 soon after taking the Israeli orchestra around the country, and no doubt as a result of the exertions of that tour. His doctor is said to have advised against it. When he got back to Boston, the same doctor told him he could not conduct the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this year. To such counsel, which meant death in life to Koussevitzky he had only one word: "Impossible!" Music was the breath of life to Koussevitzky, and he made music the breath of life to millions of Americans. In no place was he more beloved than in the Capital. It is hard to sustain the thought that his spare and austere figure, weaving a spell out of whatever orchestra he had in front of him, will no longer be seen on the podium at Constitution Hall.

This genius will always be associated with the Boston Symphony. He made the group by expert consent, the finest ensemble in the world. Its magic was the magic of Serge Koussevitzky It might be invidious to compare nim with Toscanini, and we do it only to emphasize the Koussevitzky style. Toscanini is the noble Roman in his intellectual musicianship. Koussevitzky, though a Slav by birth, was Mediterranean in his spiritual quality. He had an extraordinary feeling for melody. He had it in every pore of his being, he communicated it to his orchestra, and the orchestra poured it out to their entranced audiences. He used to sing on the dais, and the people in front found themselves singing in their hearts with him. There was a sense of flow in his orchestra which you found in no other. It was the flow of a marvelous unity.

How did he get that melody, that flow, that unity? Only by hard work, by the infinite art of taking pains. This was his "efficient secret." There was the constant drill, the damned reiteration, the attention to detail—all to knit a part into the whole, to make the fabric perfect, to seek new and newer heights of perfection. In the early days his orchestra used to grumble about his never-wearying rehearsals. They came to accept them as the price of the perfection he sparked in them. It was a triumph of leadership.

The point about Koussevitzky was his gift for animating everybody around him. The dynamism of the man in exacting improved performance was only one aspect of his leadership. He used it to realize the dream of a universal mind to put music at the disposal of millions. Till his death he beset the President and members of Congress to establish a Department of Fine Arts. This son of Russia had a passion for his adopted country, and he made it the richer for his presence.—Washington Post.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Dies in Boston at 77

Tanglewood Made Famous By Conductor

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who focused the spotlight of the musical world on the Berkshires through the Music Festival at Tanglewood, died last night at the age of 77 at the New England Medical Center, Boston.

Lovers of classical music all over the world mourned the death of the retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who rose from humble Russian beginnings to world fame as director for 25 years of the BSO.

Burial in Lenox

The funeral will be held Thursday in the Church of the Advent in Boston and at Dr. Koussevitzky's request burial will take place in Lenox.

His body will arrive from Boston Thursday afternoon and will lie in state at the Congregational Church-on-the-Hill. Burial is expected to be Friday in the Cemetery-on-the-Hill.

Dr. Koussevitzky was admitted to the hospital last Wednesday night, two days after he fell in his Brookline home and cut his forehead. Only the ailing maestro's wife, the former Olga Naumoff, niece of his first wife, was at his bedside when he died.

His estate in Lenox, the former home of Kate S. Buckingham of Chicago, was scheduled to be opened a week ago yesterday, but plans were canceled when the famed conductor's condition grew worse.

Only a few close friends were aware of the seriousness of Dr. Koussevitzky's illness. He wanted to keep his failing health a secret to avoid upsetting plans for the opening next month of the Berkshire Music Center and the 12 concerts he was scheduled to conduct at the Berkshire Festival this summer.

He had been in poor health since he was stricken last winter with a virus infection in Phoenix, Ariz., where he went following a nation-wide tour of the country with the Israel Symphony Orchestra which he brought to the United States.

At the close of last year's Festival, Dr. Koussevitzky was conducting under a terrific strain. He was under constant medical care during the final two days of the concert series.

Attending physicians made plans to have him hospitalized after the 1950 series was completed but the condition improved. Soon Dr. and Mrs. Koussevitzky left Lenox for a triumphal engagement at the Hollywood Bowl in California and later as a guest conductor abroad with the Israel orchestra. He returned to the United States in November, appeared for three weeks with the BSO and rested a short time until the Israel orchestra opened its nation-wide concert tour Jan. 7 in Washington, D.C.

Festival's Early Years

The Berkshire Festival had been operating two years before Dr. Koussevitzky entered the picture. Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge and a group of interested Berkshire County friends launched the original "Music Under the Moon" plan in Berkshire County. The first two concert series were held at the Hanna Farm in Interlaken with the late Dr. Henry Hadley conducting an orchestra made up of musicians from New York, mostly members of the New York Philharmonic.

In 1936 the scene shifted to Holmwood, the former Alfred Gwynn Vanderbilt estate, now Foxhollow School for Girls, when Dr. Koussevitzky brought to the Berkshires his great orchestra which performed before 15,000 persons at three concerts.

Rains Fail to Keep 8800 From Tanglewood

Shed Audience Soon Forgets Weather Under Spell of Boston Symphony's Program

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, July 28—The intermittent rains of the afternoon left the grounds here at Tanglewood too damp tonight for the usual multitude to sit outside and listen to the music but the 8800 that filled the large shed soon forgot the weather in the spirit

place, Tanglewood, an estate of more than 200 acres overlooking Lake Mahkeenac.

A tent served as the only auditorium at Tanglewood that first summer but a downpour on Aug. 12, when "the trombones started to ship water," was too much for Dr. Koussevitzky. "Never again," said the great conductor, would he undertake a Festival season with only a tent between his orchestra and disaster. Miss Robinson Smith and her forces lost no time in launching a campaign to raise funds to build a permanent shelter. The great Music Shed was the result through contributions totaling more than $85,000 by music lovers all over the country. From then on the Festival grew and in 1940 Dr. Koussevitzky established for young musicians throughout the world the Berkshire Music Center which now boasts an enrollment of nearly 500.

Charles Munch stepped out of his conservatism and resorted to a virtuoso conducting technic in this dynamic piece. He give a special lift to music of this kind with a pronounced rhythmical character, and at his brilliant conclusion everyone was obviously in a fine mood and ready to settle down and listen to the Prokofieff "Sixth".

Although introduced in this country less than two years ago, the Boston Symphony knows this symphony well, has made it his own, and under the understanding and masterful direction of Charles Munch it was an impressive, and at times, exciting performance. The first movement sees a bit disjointed and austere but as it progresses it becomes more coherent and takes on meaning, and recognises the Prokofieff idiom.

The slow movement with its Wagnerian touches is almost operatic in its impassioned lyricism. But it is in the last movement that the composer is his own witty, ebullient self of the "Fifth" and "Peter and the Wolf". It is full of humor and all of the old Prokofieff tricks, rapid repetitious passages dressed in original harmonic sequences, clean-cut, characteristic rhythms and fantastic leaps in tonal intervals. With a final reminiscence of the austere first movement this remarkable work comes to an accelerated, turbulent close. The audience reacted to its varied moods and rallied with a tumultuous round of applause at its conclusion. Charles Munch was recalled numerous times inviting the members of the orchestra to arise and share the well deserved success.

As we send in these lines Claudio Arrau is just starting the Brahms Second Piano Concerto about which we shall have to report later.

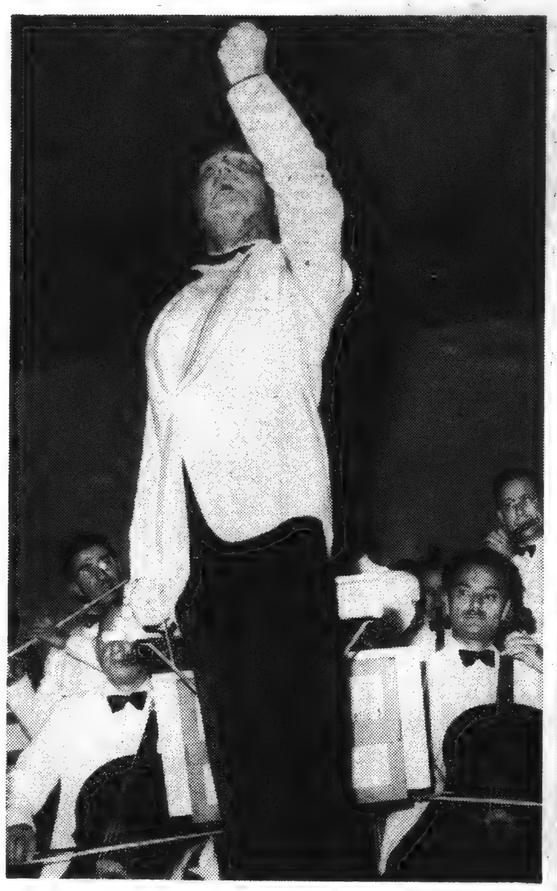
Tanglewood Milestones in the Career of Maestro Serge Koussevitzky



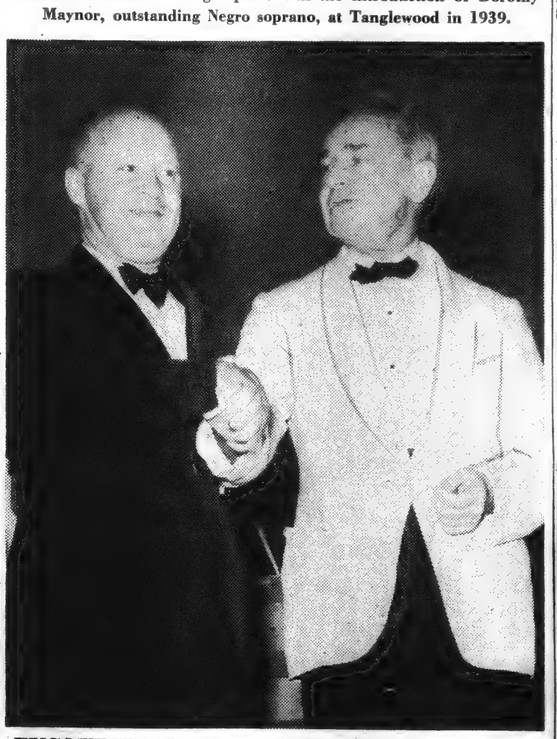
GIVE IT THE WORKS: The biggest hit of Tanglewood on Parade back in 1942 came when the maestro took over the baton for "The Stars and Stripes Forever" by the Camp Devens army band.

CROWN PRINCES: Ever-anxious to help build a new generation of conductors, Dr. Koussevitzky was largely responsible for the growing reputations of Leonard Bernstein, at left, and Eleazar Carvalho of Brazil, his two top protegées. Here they join him for the cutting of the cake on his 74th birthday, July 26, 1948, celebrated at Tanglewood.

INTRODUCTION TO FAME: Dr. Koussevitzky's interest in finding and developing new talent extended to the artist's field, where he reached a high point with the introduction of Dorothy Maynor, outstanding Negro soprano, at Tanglewood in 1939.

HIS INSTRUMENT, THE AUDIENCE: This seldom-seen view of a conductor conducting the audience occurred each year in the Shed when Dr. Koussevitzky led the singing of the national anthem.

FORMER FIRST LADY'S FIRST: A frequent visitor to Tanglewood, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt made her debut with a symphony orchestra last summer when she was the narrator for "Peter and the Wolf." This picture was taken when the Boston Symphony made a recording of the work.



ENCOURAGEMENT: In the forefront of conductors helping new composers find an audience, Dr. Koussevitzky throughout his career amassed an impressive list of "firsts" for such moderns as Paul Hindemith, here pictured with the maestro after the premiere of one of the latter's symphonies.

BRIDE AND GROOM: In August of 1947, Dr. Koussevitzky, a widower since 1942, married Olga Naumoff, his secretary for many years and niece of his first wife, in a private ceremony at Lenox.

Bitter Against Bolsheviks, Musician Fled Russia in '20

Because of his bitterness toward the Bolshevik regime, Dr. Koussevitzky quit his native land in 1920. England, Germany, Italy and Spain acclaimed him as a conductor, but he didn't reach his full genius until he was called to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The BSO had lapsed into a state of mediocrity when he took over the reins of the orchestra in 1924. He made radical changes, retiring aged musicians and firing those who could not meet his demands for perfection.

Like Toscanini, Koussevitzky was often a terror at rehearsals. Not until the Saturday morning rehearsals at Tanglewood were open to the public for the benefit of the BSO pension fund, did Berkshire music lovers get a close-up view of his demands on the 100-piece orchestra.

Sometimes he would shout, sing and pump his arms frantically, stopping only to upbraid a member of the orchestra who had offended his ears with a sour note. He would bound from his stool, crouch in an attitude of tremendous tension, stamp his feet and sway with every rhythmic pulsation of the music. The audience loved it, but the musicians never cracked a smile.

Replacement Needed for 12 Concerts

With the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, making arrangements for the coming Berkshire Festival season, are expected to engage another guest conductor to share in conducting the concerts at Tanglewood this summer.

Dr. Koussevitzky was scheduled to conduct 12 of the concerts this year. Charles Munch, the BSO director, will make his first appearance, conducting the orchestra in the Music Shed the first two weeks. Eleazar de Carvalho, the Brazilian conductor, is scheduled to appear on Aug. 5.

Opera Koussevitzky Prepared Will Be Staged at Tanglewood

Just before his illness, Dr. Koussevitzky had been working with Boris Goldovsky in the preparation of Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," which will be presented by the Opera Department at the Berkshire Music Center this summer.

Mr. Goldovsky, head of the opera department since the school was founded in 1940, had been on a leave of absence for a year but is scheduled to return to Tanglewood this summer along with Aaron Copland, noted composer, who is assistant director of the Music Center.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interest was a great factor in the opera department of the Music Center as it was in the department for composers, which he headed. Among others, Koussevitzky subsidized Benjamin Britton while he composed his English opera, "Peter Grimes," which was given its American premiere at Tanglewood a few years ago.

Beyond helping composers himself, Dr. Koussevitzky repeatedly urged the establishment of a State Department for Music to help young composers who could "refresh and vitalize the spirit of man."

He helped create the International Music Fund and conducted benefits at Tanglewood to aid the cause for composers. He enlisted the support of the executive committee of arts and letters of UNESCO. He agreed to appear in Paris later this year to conduct a concert for the benefit of the International Music Fund under the sponsorship of UNESCO. He had hoped to commission Hindemith to write a composition for the benefit from funds provided through the Koussevitzky Music Foundation.

throughout the world, fearing that symphony orchestras would not survive unless more students took up string instruments. Jascha Heifitz, the noted violinist, shared this viewpoint with Dr. Koussevitzky. Following Heifitz's appearance with the BSO at Tanglewood last year he gave his $3000 fee to the BSO to establish a scholarship for students of string instruments. The amount was matched by the trustees of the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky did his utmost to encourage young musicians by playing the works of new composers in the face of caustic comments by the critics. After he retired as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he continued as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, attempting each year to bring to the school "the best music teachers in the world." For the coming season, he engaged Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, composer and teacher, who is head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and director of the American Academy at Fontainbleau.

Conductor Won Fame on Double Bass

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky held the distinction of being one of the finest virtuosi of all time on the double bass, the "bull fiddle" of popular parlance. He composed a concerto for this instrument and orchestra, transcribed many classics for it and piano, and for several years was the double bass soloist for the Russian State Orchestra in Moscow.

His beginning in the music world was as a peasant boy in a town in North Russia. He left home at 14 with only three rubles in his pocket to beg lessons at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. It was there he acquired his technique with the double bass.

Two years after he took over as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he made recordings for Victor, playing the double bass solo for his own composition. The records were brought out again last year by RCA-Victor and found their way into many record libraries throughout the country.

Second General's Son Killed in Indo-China

HANOI, Indo-China (AP) — The war against the Communist-led Vietminh rebels has claimed another French general's son. Capt. Philippe de Lassus Saint Genies, whose father commands an armored division, was killed in action in the Ninh Binh sector on May 29.

The 28-year-old paratroop officer was the son of Gen. Marie de Lassus Saint Genies, head of the First French Armored Division.

Koussevitzky's 500 'Children' Helped Observe His Birthday

Dr. Koussevitzky's birthday was always a high light of the Tanglewood season. The public was excluded from helping him celebrate, but he loved the birthday party given by "my children," the 500 students at the Berkshire Music Center.

Each year on July 26 the students gathered around their leader while he cut his birthday cake and spoke briefly to them, always encouraging the young musicians to "study hard and help preserve good music throughout the world."

Koussevitzky was born July 26, 1874, in Vyshny, Volochek, Tver. His mother died when he was 3, but his father, a violin teacher, started the boy's musical education. At 12 he became the orchestra leader in his home town's theatre, and held the post for two years, composing incidental music for the entr' actes in addition to his other tasks.

Married in 1905

On Sept. 8, 1905, he married Natalya Konstantinovna Ushkova, after meeting her at one of his recitals in Moscow. Six years after the Koussevitzkys came to this country, his wife's niece, Olga Naumoff, joined them as Dr. Koussevitzky's secretary, a post she held until his death. His first wife died in 1942 and five years later Dr. Koussevitzky and Olga were married at a quiet ceremony in Lenox by Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church-on-the-Hill.

Besides his wife, Dr. Koussevitzky leaves a nephew, Fabian Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, and a niece, Mrs. Joseph de Pasqualle, whose husband is the first viola player in the Boston Symphony.

Aided New Composers

In the 25 years he headed the orchestra before being succeeded by Charles Munch at the beginning of the 1950 season, Koussevitzky devoted much of his time to encouraging young composers. In recent years he was alarmed over the scarcity of string musicians

Performed Many 'Firsts'

During the 25 years he served as conductor of the BSO, critics heaped upon him such praise as "The greatest conductor of our time . . . matchless virtuoso . . . incomparable master of string tone."

At Tanglewood Koussevitzky had dared render the first playing of many American works and pioneer pieces of Ravel, Prokofieff, Honegger and Shostakovitch.

He helped start successful careers for the young American conductor, Leonard Bernstein, and the Brazilian, Eleazar de Carvalho, his prize pupils at the Berkshire Music Center.

Dr. Koussevitzky turned deaf ears to staid music lovers who expressed the belief he should stick to already established pieces and big-name guest conductors.

Two years after establishing the Berkshire Music Center, Dr. Koussevitzky created the Koussevitzky Music Foundation Inc., as a memorial to his first wife who died in 1942.

In 1949 he gave the Library of Congress more than $100,000 to assist composers.

"I've known complete poverty and great wealth, much discomfort and all conveniences, and I tell you they make little difference," Koussevitzky once said, "but art is indispensable to and inseparable from the life of man."

Tanglewood Realization Of Koussevitzky's Vision

Early Dream of Music and Art Center in Moscow Comes True in New England; Encouragement of Composers, Manner of Conducting Recalled

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood will not be the same this summer without Dr. Koussevitzky. Tanglewood was his child and his influence was felt in every department of the center's activities. Just before his death he was collaborating with Boris Goldovsky in the preparation of Tchaikowsky's opera "Pique Dame" which he planned to conduct this summer. When he resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony two years ago he stated that he would continue as director of Tanglewood to the end, and this he did.

To this position he brought imagination, a powerful personality, and a vital, active interest in the center's welfare, for Dr. Koussevitzky was not only a great conductor but an artist and a visionary who had the courage and perseverence to put his ideals into practice. With his full musical background and prestige, his magnetic personality and his sincere interest in young musicians, his position as director of the Berkshire Music Center will be more difficult to fill than that of conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Composers' Friend

Composers will remember Dr. Koussevitzky with affection for his liberal commissions and many first performances. Stravinsky, Bartok, Schonberg, Honegger, Milhaud, Martinu, Britten, and the Americans, Barber, Coplan, Foss, Piston, Blitzstein, Hanson, William Schumann and Randall Thompson are some of the composers who have benefited by awards from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, a fund created in memory of the conductor's wife, Natalie, and now under the direction of the Library of Congress. In consequence our symphonic and operatic literature has been enriched by such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," Milhaud's "Second," Copland's "Third," and Piston's "Third" symphonies, as well as some 30 other works.

Dr. Koussevitzky's manner of conducting is well known to music lovers of this vicinity for with his concerts here and our visits to Tanglewood and Boston we have had the opportunity of hearing him at the head of his own orchestra. During his years with the Boston Symphony he developed it to a state of perfection which was in certain respects unsurpassed. Although his taste was a catholic one it is only natural that he should excel in certain works. Many think that his interpretations of the symphonies of Tchaikowsky and Sibelius are the definitive ones. Thanks to recordings we have permanent souvenirs of the great conductor and his orchestra in these works.

Tanglewood Vision

But it is with Tanglewood and his great accomplishment there that we shall always associate this dynamic musician. Some 14 years ago when he was expressing his hopes and aspirations for the school, he stated that he hoped it would become a center "where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. The most eminent thinkers and scholars will lecture there.

"A free co-operation of such an elite will certainly result in a creation of new and great values in art; in the radiation of the beams of culture over a nation and over the whole world; and finally, in the education and training of a new generation of American artists."

Since that time all of this has really happened at Tanglewood. He adds, "Little did I think that my own early dream of a music and art center in Moscow in the heart of Russia would find realization in the heart of New England a quarter of a century later. Indeed, miracles cannot be accounted for."

So we salute the passing of a great man, conductor, idealist, philanthropist, educator — and dreamer whose dream came true.

MUNCH TO CONDUCT

Boston, June 13. —(AP)— Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements so he could open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 7 in place of Serge Koussevitzky, who died eight days ago. A Symphony Hall announcement said Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series of concerts between July 7 and 22—originally assigned to Kossevitzky.

364 Enrolled for Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music Center, founded by the late Serge Koussevitsky, announces that 364 students from thirty-three states and eleven countries have been accepted for the six weeks' 1951 summer session at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. This enrollment exceeds the figure for the corresponding date last year by 100. As usual the student performances at Tanglewood will be open to contributing members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Details on the performances, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival and membership in the Friends may be obtained from the Berkshire Music Center.

TALKING IT OVER

Late Comers Are Perennial Problem To Concert Goers Who Are on Time

By EMMA VAN WORMER

EVERY SO OFTEN the old rebellious spirit crops up in several groups about town and elsewhere. It is rebellion against the practice of admitting late-comers to concert, ballet and opera performances. According to "Musical America," people are taking up the old refrain once again: "Do not seat late-comers until the end of the act!"

NOT LONG AGO in Eastman Theater, Rochester, that spacious auditorium with broad aisles and "room enough for the knees," the curtain was delayed for minutes, while late-comers were seated — numbers of them. Down the aisles they came in groups of four, six and eight, handsomely attired, apparently content following good food. It was a Metropolitan Opera production of the Strauss "Fledermaus," 1951 version, as presented in the "Met" under general direction of Rudolph Bing. We are happy to report that opera-goers from the Syracuse area eager to hear this gay music and watch the amusing stage business, were on time.

DURING A spring visit of the Metropolitan Opera to Boston, no one was seated during the playing of the Prelude to Wagner's great love-drama "Tristan and Isolde." All very well for purposes of concentration on the orchestral music, but the evil was only postponed, since the tardy ones straggled to their seats during the unaccompanied song of the sailor and concentrated passages of Isolde's opening diatribe.

"What to do?" asks Musical America. "We protest, but it does no good except to relieve our pent-up feelings. Perhaps next year—perhaps in the millennium!"

IN THE Theater-Concert Hall and in the great Shed in "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass., during the summer Berkshire Festival, there are comparatively few late-comers, and those few are not seated during the first movement of a Symphony. Life on the grounds at Tanglewood moves along in an orderly fashion in accordance with old New England simplicity of living. Intermission-length signals are given with ample time to make one's way from the grounds into Hall or Shed. Programs begin on time, but so great is the interest in the musical feast that the thousands on the broad lawns with seats inside promptly find their respective ways to their places. Others remaining outdoors, make themselves comfortable with cushions, blankets or small folding camp-chairs they have brought from home.

PICNIC LUNCHEONS are the rule, not the exception, in July and August in "Tanglewood." After meals, neatness and despatch are in order with paper napkins, plates and remains of foods whisked away and the place left clean and shining for the next day. One catches the spirit of the place easily, quickly. "Tanglewood" is like that—beauty everywhere, in the surroundings, in the love of music, and in the spirit of Americans with kindred tastes. There, one turns to a world of music set in natural grandeur of the Berkshire hills, a world speaking to the best that is in us.

A GREAT MUSICIAN has left Tanglewood a very great heritage in music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whom it was our privilege to meet season after season, gave of his strength and his vision to this gem of a place in the Berkshire Hills. There he was buried earlier this month, according to his wish. In Tanglewood, as in Boston, he had brought to attention new and young conductors, among them Eleazar De Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein. He led the Boston Symphony in music new to the new world, along with the Three B's—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—and other great masters of the classics, but he also brought to attention contemporary composers' most interesting works.

ON THE OPENING DAY of the Berkshire Center School last July, at the garden party following the program, Dr. Koussevitzky, immaculate in white linen, with heavy white suede gloves, was greeted by a number of music patrons. He had a word of greeting for each in the throng and stood patiently for photographs, refusing only autograph hunters.

NOT FAR FROM the refreshment tables were internationally known musicians—Jacques Ibert, French opera composer, just arrived in the states for presentation of some of his works in "Tanglewood," De Carvalho, also in white, in contrast to his rich coloring, Hugh Ross, famous Choral director, Aaron Copland, American composer, whose works have steadily won favor. (De Carvalho conducted Copland's "Appalachian Spring" here last winter when the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra played in Central High School auditorium.

THESE WERE only a few of the many just arrived for the summer session—opera, chamber music and symphonic programs. If there was one thing that Dr. Koussevitzky did not approve it was mention of Tanglewood as "America's Salzburg." He felt that Tanglewood needed no comparison with any European music center. And he well knew, through years of contacts and experience, what Europe had to offer. With the years his pride in this center increased.

LEONARD BERNSTEIN, apt pupil of Dr. Koussevitzky in conducting, who had been granted leave of absence to be in Mexico, returns to "Tanglewood" to carry on in accordance with Dr. Koussevitzky's wishes. The several programs in both The Shed and in the Theater-Concert Hall are under general supervision of Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony. Director Munch will conduct several Symphony concerts in The Shed and also will lead the Boston musicians in Bach-Haydn-Mozart programs in the Theater-Concert Hall.

MUSIC

By Edgar S. Van Olinda

Programs were announced yesterday by Charles Munch for all the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Tanglewood, July 7 to August 12. Mr. Munch, the orchestra's music director, will bring to an end his European engagements to return and make his first appearances at Tanglewood.

The programs do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theatre-concert hall and the shed concerts of the closing week.

MR. MUNCH will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, the final Chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the opening Bach concert and Mozart's funeral music at the opening concert in the shed, and has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on August 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on August 5; otherwise the concerts will all be under the leadership of Mr. Munch.

The programs will be as follows: In the theatre-concert hall, July 7—Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Concerto in C Major for three pianos; Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; Final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion; Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 6 and 4. July 8—Bach: Cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto in D minor for three pianos; Magnificat. July 14—Haydn: Symphony No. 88; piano concerto in D major (Seymour Lipkin); Symphonie Concertante; Symphony No. 104 "London." July 15—Haydn: Symphony No. 103 "Drum Roll;" Violoncello concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphonies Nos. 101 "Clock" and 92 "Oxford." July 21—Mozart: Symphony No. 35 "Haffner;" Missa Brevis, K. 192 (Hugh Ross conducting); Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Adagio and Fugue for strings; Symphony No. 39 in E flat. July 22—Mozart: Divertimento for strings and two horns; Violin concerto in A major (William Kroll); Symphony No. 38 "Prague."

'YW' TO SPONSOR TRIP TO MUSIC FESTIVAL

A YWCA sponsored bus trip to Tanglewood Music Festival, Lenox, Mass., is planned for Sunday. The group will leave the "Y" at 9:30 a.m. and take box lunches. General admission tickets will be bought.

The program by the Boston Symphony orchestra and directed by Charles Munch is as follows: Overture, "The School for Scandal" by Barber, "Quiet City" by Copland, "Symphony No. 4" by Schubert and "Symphony in D Minor" by Franck. Those interested should contact the "Y" as soon as possible as reservations will close Friday.

AT TANGLEWOOD

Death of Koussevitzky Will Cause Very Few Changes

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the lack of his physical presence, and a very considerable lack that will be, Tanglewood without Koussevitzky will be much the same. The organization that he built was fashioned so strongly that it can function without him. Since he had planned to do only the last three of the nine concerts of the festival-proper and had already relinquished the idea of conducting the Tanglewood premiere of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," the biggest change will come in the six preliminary concerts in the small hall, devoted to the music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart. Koussevitzky was to have led all of these, and they will now be directed by Charles Munch, who will also do seven of the concerts with full orchestra in the music shed, instead of five, as originally planned.

Bach and Mozart used to share the small orchestra series. This year Haydn joins them, each composer having a third of the series. These programs have been considerably changed as a result of Munch's taking over. Tributes to the deceased conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony are, of course, in [illegible] and they will be four in number.

The first will come at the initial Bach concert, in the shape of the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion, a work with which Koussevitzky's name has been closely associated. At the opening shed concert Mr. Munch will begin, not with Weber's Overture to "Oberon" but with the little-known Funeral Music of Mozart, K. 477. The performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, on August 9, which Koussevitzky was to have conducted, will now be led by Leonard Bernstein, as the third of these memorials. Finally, the opera of Tchaikovsky, which had been postponed till 1952, will be performed in Koussevitzky's memory, with Boris Goldovsky in charge. Koussevitzky had never conducted an operatic performance in this country, and there had been great interest in the projected one of "Pique Dame" under his direction.

The "Oberon" Overture, scheduled possibly because this month brings the [illegible]th anniversary of Weber's death, will now introduce the second program, in place of Beethoven's to "Fidelio." The remaining numbers on the opening program, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the Fantastic of Berlioz, keep their place. Indeed, in nearly every respect Mr. Munch's first five programs stay as projected, the only other changes being the substitution of Beethoven's Pastoral, at the concert of August 2, for the Dvorak Fourth, and of Schubert's Fourth for Mennin's Fifth, at the concert of July 29.

Eleazar De Carvalho sticks to his announced list, Guarnieri, Prokofieff and Moussorgsky-Ravel, at the concert, of August 5, but Mr. Munch has made a few alterations in the final ones. As matters now stand, he will then offer the Beethoven First, Honegger's Fifth, the Tchaikovsky Pathetic, and Brahms' Variations on a theme of Haydn and his Symphonies Nos. 2 and 4.

Like Koussevitzky before him, Mr. Munch is drawing heavily on his recent Boston programs. This makes it simpler for the orchestra, and the repetitiousness involved is not too serious since there are relatively few Bostonians among the throngs that come from all over to hear the famed Boston Symphony.

The summer music festival idea is growing, both in America and Europe, and one can often run into more interesting and unusual items than can be encountered in the winter. If the Berkshire Festival programs are an exception to this rule, the activities of the opera department at Tanglewood are not. Among its notable achievements have been the American premieres of Mozart's "Idomeneo," and Britten's "Peter Grimes" and "Albert Herring," while "Pique Dame," though not unknown even to Boston, is a great rarity.

Among the new festivals is one at the University of Virginia, devoted to the music of Mozart and the first of a projected series of "great composer" festivals there, under the auspices of The Evening Concert Groups, Inc. It will take place at Charlottsville on July 6-8; and since the Post's critic has been made an honorary founding member, and invited to attend, an account of the proceedings will appear here at a later date.

The festival will present a crossection of Mozart's work. The opera "The Impresario" will be performed, the National Gallery Orchestra of Washington will participate; there will be chamber music, vocal music, lectures, a display of Mozart relics, and what not. The choice of Mozart as composer to be honored at the inaugural festival is a happy one. He was a contemporary of Thomas Jefferson, who founded the university, and Jefferson, we know, was himself a musician of no mean attainments. He also provided in his will that instrumental and vocal music be taught in the school he established, making it, I understand, the first college in the country to have a music department.

Not many of the thousands of N. E. Conservatory students and others who have said, "Meet me at Beethoven," were aware that the heroic size bronze statue of the composer was merely a guest in the house. Actually, it belonged to the Handel and Haydn Society, which, acquired it in 1899, loaned it to the Boston Public Library in 1900 and to the conservatory three years later. At the commencement exercises of last Tuesday it was formally presented to the school.

It was 100 years ago that Charles Cahalan Perkins, who had played a part in the establishment of the Museum of Fine Arts and the old Music Hall, engaged the American sculptor, Thomas Crawford, to make the statue, which was installed in Music Hall in front of the great organ, in 1856. It was in that building that the conservatory was founded 11 years later. The statue was created in Rome and cast in the Royal Foundry in Munich, where it remained until it was brought here.

Munch Leaving Europe To Open Berkshire Fete

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, June 11 — Officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today that Charles Munch, music director, would curtail his European engagements and return to the United States the first week in July to open the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood on July 7, because of the death last week of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor emeritus of the orchestra and director of the festival.

Mr. Munch, who telephoned the directors from Paris, said there would be a minimum of change in the programs planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. He added that he had asked Leonard Bernstein, a protege of the late maestro, to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," scheduled for the evening of Aug. 9, in memory of the conductor.

Music Notes

By D. E. RITZ

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has announced the programs for this season's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Mass.

Mr. Munch is curtailing his European engagements to return for his first appearances at Tanglewood. The programs do not differ greatly from those announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall and the Shed concerts of the closing week.

Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, the final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" at the opening Bach concert and Mozart's "Funeral Music" at the opening concert in the Shed. He has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Aug. 5, otherwise the concerts will all be under the direction of Mr. Munch.

The Theatre-Concert Hall programs will be presented by a selected group from the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evenings at 8:15 o'clock and Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock beginning July 7 and continuing through July 22.

The Bach program for July 7 will include the Brandenburg Concertos numbers 2, 3, 4 and 6, the "Concerto for Three Pianos in C Major" with Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz as soloists and the final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion."

The Bach program for July 8 will include the cantata, "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" conducted by Hugh Ross, the "Concerto for Three Pianos in D minor," with the soloists of July 7 appearing; and the "Magnificat in D."

The Haydn program of July 14 will include the "Symphony number 88, in G major;" the "Piano Concerto in D major" with Seymour Lipkin as soloist; the "Symphonie Concertante" for violin, 'cello, oboe and bassoon; and the "Symphony number 104, 'London.'"

The Haydn program of July 15 will include the "Symphony number 103, 'Drum Roll;'" "Violoncello Concerto" with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist; and the "Symphonies number 101 and 92."

The Mozart program of July 21 will include the "Symphony number 35, 'Haffner;'" the "Missa Brevis," K. 192, with Hugh Ross conducting; "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik;" "Adagio and Fugue for Strings" and the "Symphony in E-flat, number 39."

The July 22 program, also Mozart, will include the "Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K. 287;" "Violin Concerto in A Major" with William Kroll as the soloist; and the "Symphony number 38, 'Prague.'"

The concerts in the Shed will open on July 26 and be held on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons through Aug. 12. The programs will be presented by the full membership of the Boston Symphony with evening programs starting at 8:15 o'clock and afternoon programs at 3 o'clock.

The July 26 program will include the Mozart' "Funeral Music, K. 477;" the Schumann "Symphony number 4" and the Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony."

The July 28 program will consist of the Weber "Overture to 'Beron;'" the Prokofieff "Symphony number 6" and the Brahms "Piano Concerto number 2" with Claudio Arrau as soloist.

The program for July 29 includes the Barber "Overture to the School for Scandal;" Copland's "Quiet City;" the Schubert "Symphony number 4" and the Franck "Symphony in D minor."

The Aug. 2 program will be made up of the Schumann "Overture to Genoveva;" the Beethoven "Symphony number 6, 'Pastorale;'" Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and the Roussel "Symphony number 3."

The Aug. 4 program will include Handel's "Water Music;" Bartok's "Music for Strings and Percussion;" Strauss "Don Juan" and the Saint-Saens "Symphony number 3 with Organ."

The Aug. 5 program will include Guarnieri's "Symphony number 2;" Prokofieff's "Piano Concerto number 2" with Jorge Bolet as soloist and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis" on Aug. 9 with Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass, as the soloists.

The program for the Aug. 11 concert will include the Beethoven "Symphony number 1;" Honegger "Symphony number 5;" and the Tchaikovsky "Symphony number 6, 'Pathetique.'"

The concluding program on Aug. 12 will be devoted to Brahms and will include the "Variations on a Theme by Haydn;" and the "Symphonies number 2 and 4."

The Schenectady Symphony is putting final touches on the program for its annual "Music Under the Stars" concert. It will be given Saturday evening at 8:15 o'clock at Daley Field on the Union College Campus with Anthony Stefan conducting. Among the numbers planned are the "Artists' Life" waltz by Strauss and Leroy Anderson's "Syncopated Clock." Also the latter's "Jazz Pizzicato" and "Trumpeter's Lullaby." Joseph Mirate will be the trumpet soloist. We hope the "stars" will co-operate.

Leroy Van Patten, son of Mrs Mae Van Patten of 231 Liberty street, will be graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston today. A graduate of Schenectady high school, he has majored in voice and piano and has accepted a position as supervisor of music in the public schools of Ellsworth, Me. His wife, also a vocalist, is a graduate of the Massachusetts School of Physiotherapy. Mr. Van Patten has served as tenor soloist at Beth Eden Baptist Church at Waltham, Mass., and has sung with the Cecilia Society in Boston for the past five years.

Joseph G. Derrick, director of the Schenectady Conservatory of Music and the new president of the Schenectady Civic Music Association, has a nice vacation lined up. He will leave Schenectady on July 1 for two weeks at Duxbury, Mass., where he will be the guest of his friend, Howard Goding, dean of the piano department at the New England Conservatory of Music. Then he will move to his camp at Stockbridge Bowl and spend the balance of the summer there.

3 Arizonans Off Tomorrow For Berkshire Music Study

Three young Arizonans will attend the six-week summer sessions at the famed Berkshire Music Center at Lenox, Mass.

The trio, Neil Shafer and James Mooney of Phoenix and Fred Bradford of Yuma, will leave Phoenix Wednesday by bus. They received scholarships to the center after auditions before the late Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor who was head of the center.

Through the efforts of Mrs. Albert Spector, 933 W. Willetta, $225 was raised among Phoenicians to help the boys' musical education this summer.

All three are members of the Phoenix Symphony Orchestra. Shafer, son of Dr. and Mrs. Joseph Shafer, 810 E. Cambridge Ave., has played viola with the orchestra since its beginning four years ago.

Mooney has been clarinetist with the orchestra four years. His parents are Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Mooney, 1909 W. Monte Vista Rd.

Bradford, son of Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Bradford of Yuma, has played French horn with the symphony three years.

Bernstein To Direct Mass In Memory of Koussevitzky

BOSTON, June 16—(Sp)—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning the first week of July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on July 7. He will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theatre concert hall and will also conduct the final week of concerts.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead a concert on Aug 5, and Mr Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis already scheduled for Aug 9, in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr Koussevitzky's work in the school.

Barrington' Mansion to House Vacationing Employees

Sale Signals End of an Era

GREAT BARRINGTON, MASS. (AP)—A fantastic and fabulous era which sprinkled Massachusetts' famous Berkshire Hills with dreamlike palaces is fading into history.

Sale of Barrington House, a great blue-stone mansion of French chateau style, to the Home Insurance Company of New York is a symbol of a chapter's end.

Barrington House will go the way of Shadowbrook, of Ashintully, of Tanglewood, of Brookmere, of Erskine Park, of many other estates and huge homes—monuments to vanished men and another way of life.

Famous Names.

The families who lived in them bore names to conjure with—Carnegie, Vanderbilt, Field and Biddle, Hopkins, Tytus, Adams and Stokes, Stuyvesant, Harriman, Crocker, Aspinwall and Sloane.

Barrington House was built 65 years ago. Into it and its surrounding meadows, the widow of railroad builder Mark Hopkins and her new husband poured part of Hopkins' Union Pacific millions.

The house was built in a golden age which filled the beauty spots of Newport, R. I., and of Lenox, Stockbridge, and other Berkshire towns, with romantic villas, unbelievable gardens, and stately mansions.

Mark Hopkins' widow lived but four years after her grand house was built. Then it passed to her second husband, Edward E. Searles.

Private School.

After a period of dust-gathering disuse, the mansion became a private school for girls. And now the basement will become a storage for the microfilm records of the insurance company.

The remainder of the property, from which common folk were long barred, will become a recreation center for the firm's employees.

A special quarry on a mile-distant mountainside provided stone for the big house and its thousands of yards of dressed stone walls. A specially-built railroad hauled the stone.

Indirect Light.

But a private power plant was not unique, even then. Northward, in villa-dotted Lenox, George Westinghouse built his spreading "Erskine Park" (one day also to become a school for girls).

Not pleased with the glare of 1,500 electric bulbs, Mrs. Westinghouse suggested a special molding where ceilings joined walls. Thus originated domestic indirect lighting.

Tanglewood — at the Stockbridge and Lenox town border— where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote his Tanglewood Tales—now is the home of the famous Berkshire music festivals of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Staircase.

Thousand-acre Shadowbrook, where Anson Phelps Stokes built a hundred-room grey-stone house with scarlet roof, later was the home of Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, and afterwards of Andrew Carnegie.

A four-horse coach could have clattered up its main staircase. Now Shadowbrook is a Jesuit novitiate.

Stories handed down from Shadowbrook's heyday shed light on that era of vast house parties.

A son of Stokes, coming home from Yale with some friends of the class of 1896 wired: "Coming home bringing some '96 men." Perhaps his mother read too hastily, but she telegraphed this reply: "House full—room for only 40."

Dead Kings.

Outmatching even Shadowbrook was "Ashintully"—the estate of Robb de Peyster Tytus, Egyptologist. Some said the family had incurred the displeasure of Egypt's dead kings by disturbing their sleep.

Lenox was home to the Biddles, the Adamses, the Crockers, the Aspinwalls, the Stuyvesants, the Harrimans, and many another family of famous name.

Neighboring Stockbridge, like Lenox, was filled with names and homes of the once-great as were other towns up and down the county.

Gardens.

Gardens sprang up that rivaled the centuries-old gardens of Europe. Owners and agents combed the world for ironwork, statuary and fountains.

There were swans, peacocks, and conservatories with tropical and semi-tropical flowers and fruits.

Gone today are the troops of immigrant servants who once made it possible for others to be gay in the many-roomed mansions.

Hard-to-get (and pay for) are butlers, gardeners, and other workers needed to keep up the grand air. So houses and gates have been closed.

Dust.

Dust gathers in rooms once bright with finery and laughter. Prospective dairy farmers and hotel operators have shopped among the "for sale" signs.

Some properties have been cut up for the more streamlined, and simpler estate of today. In these, unexpected luxury hides behind outward simplicity.

For Berkshire still is Berkshire and illustrious names sparkle in Berkshire directories. These are hailed as worthy successors to Bryant, to Longfellow, to Melville, to Hawthorne, to Edith Wharton, to the Sedgwicks and others—even to George Francis Root.

Song Writer.

You don't know Root? Oh yes, you do.

He wrote sentimental war songs that shook folks' hearts long years ago: "The Battle Cry of Freedom," "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys are Marching," "Just Before the Battle, Mother," and "The Vacant Chair."

Fabulous "Barrington House" mansion will become vacation spot for employees of Home Insurance Company of New York. Its sale symbolizes end of an era.

Beyond wall and hedge armies of gardeners spread an ever-changing prospect of flowers. There were swans, peacocks, and conservatories with tropical and semi-tropical flowers and fruits.

This month—June—is being observed in Protestant churches across the country as Christiansen month to honor Dr. F. Melius Christiansen, noted choir director and composer of Northfield, Minn. Dr. Christiansen, just turned 80, arrived in the United States 62 years ago, a young Norwegian immigrant, destined to become one of America's masters of religious music. He achieved fame during the 42 years he directed the choir of St. Olaf college at Northfield. Under his leadership the choir has become one of the best known in the world.

Because it was difficult to find suitable music for an a cappella choir, Dr. Christiansen began writing music for his organization. He has written more than 600 selections. His best-known compositions are "Beautiful Saviour," and "Today There Is Ringing." He wrote the oratorio for orchestra and choir, "The Prodigal Son," which has been heard in the principal music halls of the United States and Europe.

Tanglewood Programs

In the second concert of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Charles Munch will conduct a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians in a Bach program this afternoon in the Theater-Concert Hall. The concerts of next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon are devoted to Haydn. The programs are:

Today, 3—Bach: Cantata, "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto for three pianos, in D minor; Magnificat.

Saturday, 8:15—Haydn: Symphony No. 88, in G major; Piano concerto in D major (Seymour Lipkin); Symphonie Concertante, for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon; Symphony No. 104 (London).

Next Sunday, 3—Haydn: Symphony No. 103 (Drum Roll); Cello concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphonies Nos. 101 (Clock) and 92 (Oxford).

Information about the various concerts by students of the Berkshire Music Center may be obtained by writing to the Center at Tanglewood. The New Music Quartet will give the first of three concerts provided through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress at Tanglewood next Wednesday night at 8:15, playing quartets of Hindemith, Verdi and Beethoven. On the following Wednesday night, July 18, the Berkshire Trio will play seventeenth and eighteenth century music, and the Moyse Trio will play early and contemporary works on Wednesday, July 25. These three concerts, it is announced, will be open to students, Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public.

The Choir of New York's Central Presbyterian Church, with Hugh Giles as organist and choirmaster, will give the second of the summer's Sunday Evening Concerts tonight at Scott's Cove, Darien, Conn. A program of contemporary music includes Erik Satie's "Messe des Pauvres," Virgil Thomson's Mass for two-part chorus and percussion and the "Messe Solennelle," by Jean Langlais. Mr. Giles and Natalie Risbeck, pianist, will also play works of Ravel, Infante, Portnoff and Debussy.

Era of Grand Berkshire Mansions Passes

Barrington House Is Chapter's End

GREAT BARRINGTON, Mass. ().—A fantastic and fabulous era hich sprinkled Massachusetts' mous Berkshire Hills with eam-like palaces is fading into story.

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning the first week of July to open the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood on July 7. He will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall and, in addition to the two weeks of Shed concerts already announced, will conduct the final week of the concerts.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned, and Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" already scheduled for Thursday, Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, long conductor of the Boston, who died last week. Mr. Munch has announced there will be a minimum of change in the programs originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mario Lanza, who stars in "The Great Caruso," opening Sunday at the Michigan theater, appeared in Jackson three years ago with the Bel Canto trio, an attraction of the Community Concert Assn. Mr. Lanza, then as now, was the object of much comment, some good, some bad. Few who heard him here, however will deny that Lanza had a fine voice, although most were agreed that his, at that time, was not one of outstanding qualities. Since then, Mr. Lanza has skyrocketed to national prominence, hailed as one critic put it as "the reincarnation of the voice of Caruso." This writer has seen two of the Lanza pictures and commented briefly on one of them. We will withhold further judgment until after we see "The Great Caruso."

Dr. Christiansen retired in 1944 as director of the St. Olaf choir and was succeeded by his son, Olaf Christiansen.

Invitations have been sent to 300 advanced music students from 19 countries, including 100 from the United States to attend the 50th anniversary Munich opera festival, July 1-31. George Hartmann, impersario of the festival, has announced the students will be guests of the Bavarian State opera. The musicians will understudy stars and go backstage during performances to gain a practical insight into the mechanical problems connected with operatic production, Mr. Hartmann said.

George Szell, who now is in Europe, will return Oct. 1 for his sixth season as head of the Cleveland orchestra. He also will be guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony for six weeks during the season. During his vacation abroad this summer, Mr. Szell's only musical committment will be two concerts with the Amsterdam Concertgebouw orchestra at the Holland festival June 28 and 30.

Rudolph Bing, general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, also is in Europe this summer, combining vacation and scouting for new talent for the Met. He will visit France, Italy, Germany and Holland to attend performances and negotiate with artists for future appearances at the Metropolitan. He will return to New York early in September to prepare for his second season at the Met, opening Nov. 13, and presumably will make further anndunce ments then about his plans for the season.

Noted Soloists to Assist At Choral Union Concert

At the concert to be given by the Litchfield County Choral Union in the Norfolk Music Shed on the afternoon of Sunday, May 27th, three outstanding soloists will assist the chorus in the presentation of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Hear My Prayer."

Helen Boatwright, soprano, is one of the most sought-after of the younger concert and oratorio singers. The range of her repertoire is unusually wide, as is shown by the fact that in one spring season she was soloist with Paul Hindemith's Collegium Musicum, at Yale University in a concert of 15th century music, soloist at the famous Bach Festival, at Bethlehem, Pa., and soloist in the first performance of a contemporary work for soprano and orchestra at Town Hall in New York City.

Mrs. Boatwright has also proved her amazing versatility in many operatic parts. She has sung leading roles opposite Mario Lanza and James Pease, and has appeared in the opera workshop of the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood.

Gertrude Sherwill began her early musical career in Torrington under the tutorage of Flora Finlayson Fenton. She then studied for several years with Frank LaForge, in New York, and with Sarah Peck Moore, of Hartford and New York. She was soprano soloist at the Center Congregational Church in Torrington for 15 years and then accepted her present position as soloist of the First Congregational Church in Waterbury.

Lawrence Madison, tenor, a resident of Norfolk, studies with George Pickering, of New York, Philadelphia and Albany. He has appeared as soloist with numerous choruses in New England cities, including Boston, Hartford, Pittsfield, Waterbury and Troy, N. Y. He has sung the leading tenor part in many of the world's best known oratorios, including Bach's "Passion According to St. Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Handel's "Messiah", and Mendelssohn's John," Mozart's "Requiem," Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis in D," "Elijah." He has been soloist in several of the large Boston churches, at the Center Church in Hartford, and is at present at St. James Episcopal Church in Great Barrington.

The concert will be directed by G. Loring Burwell, of Waterbury, one of America's outstanding conductors. Choruses at present under his baton include the Mendelssohn Male Chorus of Waterbury, the Torrington Male Choral Club, the Alpha Male Chorus of New Haven, the Peoples Chorus (Oratorio) and the Post Junior College Glee Club of Waterbury. He has conducted massed choruses of 1,000 men, or more, at Randall's Island and White Plains, N. Y., and the world's largest male chorus, of 3,600, at the World's Fair in New York.

Tanglewood Realization Of Koussevitzky's Vision

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood will not be the same this summer without Dr. Koussevitzky. Tanglewood was his child and his influence was felt in every department of the center's activities. Just before his death he was collaborating with Boris Goldovsky in the preparation of Tchaikowsky's opera "Pique Dame" which he planned to conduct this summer. When he resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony two years ago he stated that he would continue as director of Tanglewood to the end, and this he did.

To this position he brought imagination, a powerful personality, and a vital, active interest in the center's welfare, for Dr. Koussevitzky was not only a great conductor but an artist and a visionary who had the courage and perseverence to put his ideals into practice. With his full musical background and prestige, his magnetic personality and his sincere interest in young musicians, his position as director of the Berkshire Music Center will be more difficult to fill than that of conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Composers' Friend

Composers will remember Dr. Koussevitzky with affection for his libera commissions and many first performances. Stravinsky, Bartok, Schoenberg, Honegger, Milhaud, Martinu Britten, and the Americans, Barber Coplan, Foss, Piston, Blitzstein, Hanson, William Schumann and Randal Thompson are some of the composers who have benefited by awards from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, a fund created in memory of the conductor's wife, Natalie, and now under the direction of the Library of Congress. In consequence our symphonic and operatic literature has been enriched by such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," Milhaud's "Second," Copland's "Third," and Piston's "Third" symphonies, as well as some 30 other works.

Dr. Koussevitzky's manner of conducting is well known to music lovers of this vicinity for with his concerts here and our visits to Tanglewood and Boston we have had the opportunity of hearing him at the head of his own orchestra. During his years with the Boston Symphony he developed it to a state of perfection which was in certain respects unsurpassed. Although his taste was a catholic one it is only natural that he should excel in certain works. Many think that his interpretations of the symphonies of Tchaikowsky and Sibelius are the definitive ones. Thanks to recordings we have permanent souvenirs of the great conductor and his orchestra in these works.

But it is with Tanglewood and his great accomplishment there that we shall always associate this dynamic musician. Some 14 years ago when he was expressing his hopes and aspirations for the school, he stated that he hoped it would become a center "where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. The most eminent thinkers and scholars will lecture there.

"A free co-operation of such an elite will certainly result in a creation of new and great values in art; in the radiation of the beams of culture over a nation and over the whole world; and finally, in the education and training of a new generation of American artists."

Since that time all of this has really happened at Tanglewood. He adds, "Little did I think that my own early dream of a music and art center in Moscow in the heart of Russia would find realization in the heart of New England a quarter of a century later. Indeed, miracles cannot be accounted for."

So we salute the passing of a great man, conductor, idealist, philanthropist, educator — and dreamer whose dream came true.

Munch Curtails Tour to Conduct Tanglewood Debut

BOSTON, June 12 A.P.—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements so he could open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 7 in place of Serge Koussevitzky, who died eight days ago.

A symphony hall announcement said Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series of concerts between July 7 and 22—originally assigned to Koussevitzky.

Munch was to have made his Tanglewood debut conducting the first two weeks of concerts in the music shed July 26-Aug. 4 and Koussevitzky was to have closed the shed concerts Aug. 9-12. Now Munch will conduct all three weeks.

Leonard Bernstein will return from Mexico to take over the Berkshire Music center which Koussevitzky founded at Tanglewood.

The announcement said also that Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis Aug. 9 in memory of Koussevitzky at the invitation of Munch.

Munch Stars At Festival

B C. R. ROSEBERRY

A noble and [illegible] performance of [illegible] all piano concerto [illegible] Brahms in C minor and the Boston Symphony orchestra, [illegible] weekend [illegible] with two programs [illegible] contemporary [illegible] interest with standard concert favorites.

Rain and [illegible] curtailed [illegible] category of [illegible] sions—those persons who take [illegible] broad lawns [illegible] shed. But [illegible] still tremendous [illegible] night's crowd was 5,600 [illegible] sheltered seats [illegible] ing 6,000 [illegible] rain acted [illegible] concert.

While the spirit of the late Sergei Koussevitzky will continue to hover about all the remaining concerts of the Berkshire Festival, a fresh and vigorous homage is being paid his successor, Charles Munch. Music, like the show must go on. It is the virile-poetic genius of Munch which is causing it to go on for Tanglewood's pilgrims.

Array's playing of the Brahms concerto Saturday night was as monumental as the composition itself. The orchestra and the solo instrument were more nearly on terms of equality [illegible] as they should be in this piece. Indeed, there was the abiding sense of two fine artists working together—Arrau and Munch. The South American pianist approached the work with thoughtfulness and reverence, rather than [illegible] virtuoso flamboyance; he conveyed its most [illegible] climaxes majestically, without once suggesting that it might be a show-piece.

SELDOM HAS SUCH pure beauty woven its spell over a Tanglewood audience as [illegible] created in that miraculously lively slow movement of the Brahms Second.

Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony preceded it on the program—a work in utter contrast, but which Munch and his percussionists gave everything that could be given to something that depends on sound and rhythm for its effects. There was also Weber's old standby, the Overture to "Oberon," done with freshness, as an opener.

Yesterday's audience was treated to Cesar Franck's Symphony, wherein Munch again demonstrated his capacity for treating standard material in un-standard fashion. The Sunday program also included Schubert's Fourth ("Tragic") Symphony; and two modern compositions—Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City"—both composers being present to take the bows.

Tanglewood Festival To Open July 7

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning the first week of July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 7. He will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts and in addition to the two weeks of shed concerts already announced will also conduct the final week of concerts. Eleazar De Carvolho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned, and Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis already scheduled for Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire [illegible] school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his closest associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department ,will stage and conduct Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" and the school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos."

There is no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments.

Aaron Copland who has been in the American Academy at Rome, will return in time for the school's opening exercises on July 1.

Mr. Munch who has been conducting concerts in Paris and elsewhere will close his European season in Strasbourg June 25 and will return to America to arrive in Lenox for the opening Bach concerts. Mr. Munch has sent word that there will be a minimum of change in the programs originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. Full program details will be announced shortly.

Atlanta's Miss Dobbs Will Continue European Study

Miss Mattiwilda Dobbs, in connection with her voice study in Paris ,has appeared as soprano soloist in several European cities. Miss Dobbs, the daughter of John Wesley Dobbs, has been in Paris since last September studying on a John Hay Whitney fellowship.

A lyric soprano, she has been studying under Pierre Bernac, noted French tenor and singing coach. She will finish her studies with M. Bernac at the end of the month and go to Madrid in June where she will study with the masters there.

She will rejoin one of her former instructors, Mme. Lotte Leonard, in Switzerland in August. Mme. Leonard was one of her singing instructors in New York.

During the fall and winter, Miss Dobbs will journey to Milan, Italy to study at the world-famous La Scala Opera School. Some of the world's most noted operatic stars have undergone their training at the La Scala.

During this time, she will be giving recitals in various other cities. So far, she is scheduled to appear in Holland on May 26 for a recital.

A 1946 graduate of Spelman College, Miss Dobbs has done extensive graduate study. She has a master's degree in Spanish from Columbia University; has studied at the University of Mexico and won a scholarship to the Berkshire Hills music camp with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Her father, J. W. Dobbs, stated that he is not expecting his daughter to return to Atlanta until 1952. By then, he says, she will "really be ready."

Noted Soloists to Assist At Choral Union Concert

At the concert to be given by the Litchfield County Choral Union in the Norfolk Music Shed on the afternoon of Sunday, May 27th, three outstanding soloists will assist the chorus in the presentation of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Hear My Prayer."

Helen Boatwright, soprano, is one of the most sought-after of the younger concert and oratorio singers. The range of her repertoire is unusually wide, as is shown by the fact that in one spring season she was soloist with Paul Hindemith's Collegium Musicum, at Yale University in a concert of 15th century music, soloist at the famous Bach Festival, at Bethlehem, Pa., and soloist in the first performance of a contemporary work for soprano and orchestra at Town Hall in New York City.

Mrs. Boatwright has also proved her amazing versatility in many operatic parts. She has sung leading roles opposite Mario Lanza and James Pease, and has appeared in the opera workshop of the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood.

Gertrude Sherwill began her early musical career in Torrington under the tutorage of Flora Finlayson Fenton. She then studied for several years with Frank LaForge, in New York, and with Sarah Peck Moore, of Hartford and New York. She was soprano soloist at the Center Congregational Church in Torrington for 15 years and then accepted her present position as soloist of the First Congregational Church in Waterbury.

Lawrence Madison, tenor, a resident of Norfolk, studies with George Pickering, of New York, Philadelphia and Albany. He has appeared as soloist with numerous choruses in New England cities, including Boston, Hartford, Pittsfield, Waterbury and Troy, N. Y. He has sung the leading tenor part in many of the world's best known oratorios, including Bach's "Passion According to St. Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Handel's "Messiah", and Mendelssohn's John," Mozart's "Requiem," Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis in D," "Elijah." He has been soloist in several of the large Boston churches, at the Center Church in Hartford, and is at present at St. James Episcopal Church in Great Barrington.

The concert will be directed by G. Loring Burwell, of Waterbury, one of America's outstanding conductors. Choruses at present under his baton include the Mendelssohn Male Chorus of Waterbury, the Torrington Male Choral Club, the Alpha Male Chorus of New Haven, the Peoples Chorus (Oratorio) and the Post Junior College Glee Club of Waterbury. He has conducted massed choruses of 1,000 men, or more, at Randall's Island and White Plains, N. Y., and the world's largest male chorus, of 3,600, at the World's Fair in New York.

Tanglewood Realization Of Koussevitzky's Vision

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood will not be the same this summer without Dr. Koussevitzky. Tanglewood was his child and his influence was felt in every department of the center's activities. Just before his death he was collaborating with Boris Goldovsky in the preparation of Tchaikowsky's opera "Pique Dame" which he planned to conduct this summer. When he resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony two years ago he stated that he would continue as director of Tanglewood to the end, and this he did.

To this position he brought imagination, a powerful personality, and a vital, active interest in the center's welfare, for Dr. Koussevitzky was not only a great conductor but an artist and a visionary who had the courage and perseverence to put his ideals into practice. With his full musical background and prestige, his magnetic personality and his sincere interest in young musicians, his position as director of the Berkshire Music Center will be more difficult to fill than that of conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Composers' Friend

Composers will remember Dr. Koussevitzky with affection for his liberal commissions and many first performances. Stravinsky, Bartok, Schoenberg, Honegger, Milhaud, Martinu, Britten, and the Americans, Barber, Coplan, Foss, Piston, Blitzstein, Hanson, William Schumann and Randal Thompson are some of the composers who have benefited by awards from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, a fund created in memory of the conductor's wife, Natalie, and now under the direction of the Library of Congress. In consequence our symphonic and operatic literature has been enriched by such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," Milhaud's "Second," Copland's "Third," and Piston's "Third" symphonies, as well as some 30 other works.

Dr. Koussevitzky's manner of conducting is well known to music lovers of this vicinity for with his concerts here and our visits to Tanglewood and Boston we have had the opportunity of hearing him at the head of his own orchestra. During his years with the Boston Symphony he developed it to a state of perfection which was in certain respects unsurpassed. 'Although his taste was a catholic one it is only natural that he should excel in certain works. Many think that his interpretations of the symphonies of Tchaikowsky and Sibelius are the definitive ones. Thanks to recordings we have permanent souvenirs of the great conductor and his orchestra in these works.

Tanglewood Vision

But it is with Tanglewood and his great accomplishment there that we shall always associate this dynamic musician. Some 14 years ago when he was expressing his hopes and aspirations for the school, he stated that he hoped it would become a center "where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. Munch Stars At Festival

BY C. R. ROSENBERG

A noble and triumphant performance of that greatest of all piano concertos, the Second Brahms, by Claudio Arrau and the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the highlight of the weekend music at Tanglewood, with two programs in which contemporary works divided interest with standard concert favorites.

Rain and the threat of rain curtailed attendance in the category of "ground-admissions"—those devotees who take their chances on the broad lawns around the music shed. But the audiences were still tremendous. Saturday night's crowd was 8,000 (the sheltered seating-capacity being 6,000) and only a little rain actually fell during the concert.

Noted Soloists to Assist At Choral Union Concert

At the concert to be given by the Litchfield County Choral Union in the Norfolk Music Shed on the afternoon of Sunday, May 27th, three outstanding soloists will assist the chorus in the presentation of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Hear My Prayer."

Helen Boatwright, soprano, is one of the most sought-after of the younger concert and oratorio singers. The range of her repertoire is unusually wide, as is shown by the fact that in one spring season she was soloist with Paul Hindemith's Collegium Musicum, at Yale University in a concert of 15th century music, soloist at the famous Bach Festival, at Bethlehem, Pa., and soloist in the first performance of a contemporary work for soprano and orchestra at Town Hall in New York City.

Mrs. Boatwright has also proved her amazing versatility in many operatic parts. She has sung leading roles opposite Mario Lanza and James Pease, and has appeared in the opera workshop of the Berkshire Music Center, at Tanglewood.

Gertrude Sherwill began her early musical career in Torrington under the tutorage of Flora Finlayson Fenton. She then studied for several years with Frank LaForge, in New York, and with Sarah Peck Moore, of Hartford and New York. She was soprano soloist at the Center Congregational Church in Torrington for 15 years and then accepted her present position as soloist of the First Congregational Church in Waterbury.

Lawrence Madison, tenor, a resident of Norfolk, studies with George Pickering, of New York, Philadelphia and Albany. He has appeared as soloist with numerous choruses in New England cities, including Boston, Hartford, Pittsfield, Waterbury and Troy, N. Y. He has sung the leading tenor part in many of the world's best known oratorios, including Bach's "Passion According to St. Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Handel's "Messiah", and Mendelssohn's John," Mozart's "Requiem," Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis in D," "Elijah." He has been soloist in several of the large Boston churches, at the Center Church in Hartford, and is at present at St. James Episcopal Church in Great Barrington.

The concert will be directed by G. Loring Burwell, of Waterbury, one of America's outstanding conductors. Choruses at present under his baton include the Mendelssohn Male Chorus of Waterbury, the Torrington Male Choral Club, the Alpha Male Chorus of New Haven, the Peoples Chorus (Oratorio) and the Post Junior College Glee Club of Waterbury. He has conducted massed choruses of 1,000 men, or more, at Randall's Island and White Plains, N. Y., and the world's largest male chorus, of 3,600, at the World's Fair in New York.

Tanglewood Realization Of Koussevitzky's Vision

By VICTOR PRAHL

Tanglewood will not be the same this summer without Dr. Koussevitzky. Tanglewood was his child and his influence was felt in every department of the center's activities. Just before his death he was collaborating with Boris Goldovsky in the preparation of Tchaikowsky's opera "Pique Dame" which he planned to conduct this summer. When he resigned as conductor of the Boston Symphony two years ago he stated that he would continue as director of Tanglewood to the end, and this he did.

To this position he brought imagination, a powerful personality, and a vital, active interest in the center's welfare, for Dr. Koussevitzky was not only a great conductor but an artist and a visionary who had the courage and perseverence to put his ideals into practice. With his full musical background and prestige, his magnetic personality and his sincere interest in young musicians, his position as director of the Berkshire Music Center will be more difficult to fill than that of conductor of the Boston Symphony.

Composers' Friend

Composers will remember Dr. Koussevitzky with affection for his libera commissions and many first performances. Stravinsky, Bartok, Schoenberg, Honegger, Milhaud, Martinu Britten, and the Americans, Barber Coplan, Foss, Piston, Blitzstein, Hanson, William Schumann and Randal Thompson are some of the composers who have benefited by awards from the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, a fund created in memory of the conductor's wife, Natalie, and now under the direction of the Library of Congress. In consequence our symphonic and operatic literature has been enriched by such works as Britten's "Peter Grimes," Bartok's "Concerto for Orchestra," Milhaud's "Second," Copland's "Third," and Piston's "Third" symphonies, as well as some 30 other works.

Dr. Koussevitzky's manner of conducting is well known to music lovers of this vicinity for with his concerts here and our visits to Tanglewood and Boston we have had the opportunity of hearing him at the head of his own orchestra. During his years with the Boston Symphony he developed it to a state of perfection which was in certain respects unsurpassed. Although his taste was a catholic one it is only natural that he should excel in certain works. Many think that his interpretations of the symphonies of Tchaikowsky and Sibelius are the definitive ones. Thanks to recordings we have permanent souvenirs of the great conductor and his orchestra in these works.

But it is with Tanglewood and his great accomplishment there that we shall always associate this dynamic musician. Some 14 years ago when he was expressing his hopes and aspirations for the school, he stated that he hoped it would become a center "where the greatest living composers will teach the art of composition; the greatest virtuosi, the art of perfect performance; the greatest conductors, the mystery of conducting orchestras and choruses. The most eminent thinkers and scholars will lecture there.

"A free co-operation of such an elite will certainly result in a creation of new and great values in art; in the radiation of the beams of culture over a nation and over the whole world; and finally, in the education and training of a new generation of American artists."

Since that time all of this has really happened at Tanglewood. He adds, "Little did I think that my own early dream of a music and art center in Moscow in the heart of Russia would find realization in the heart of New England a quarter of a century later. Indeed, miracles cannot be accounted for."

So we salute the passing of a great man, conductor, idealist, philanthropist, educator — and dreamer who dream came true.

Munch Curtails Tour to Conduct Tanglewood Debut

BOSTON, June 12 A.P.—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements so he could open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood July 7 in place of Serge Koussevitzky, who died eight days ago.

A symphony hall announcement said Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series of concerts between July 7 and 22—originally assigned to Koussevitzky.

Munch was to have made his Tanglewood debut conducting the first two weeks of concerts in the music shed July 26-Aug. 4 and Koussevitzky was to have closed the shed concerts Aug. 9-12. Now Munch will conduct all three weeks.

Leonard Bernstein will return from Mexico to take over the Berkshire Music center which Koussevitzky founded at Tanglewood.

The announcement said also that Bernstein will conduct Bethoven's Missa Solemnis Aug. 9 in memory of Koussevitzky at the invitation of Munch.

Apart's playing of the Brahms concerto Saturday night was as monumental as the composition itself. The orchestra and the solo instrument were more nearly on terms of equality . . . as there should be in this piece. Indeed, there was the abiding sense of two fine artists working together—Arrau and Munch. The South American pianist approached the work with thoughtfulness and reverence, rather than all-out virtuoso flamboyance; he conveyed its more expansive climaxes majestically, without once suggesting that it might be a show-piece.

SELDOM HAS SUCH [illegible] beauty woven its spell over a Tanglewood audience as Arrau created in that [illegible] lively slow movement of the Brahms Second.

Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony preceded it on the program—a work in utter contrast, but which Munch and his perfectionists gave everything that could be given to, something that depends on aerial and rhythm for its effects. There was also Weber's old standby, the Overture to "Oberon," done with freshness, as an opener.

Yesterday's audience was treated to Cesar Franck's Symphony, wherein Munch again demonstrated his capacity for treating standard material in un-standard fashion. The Sunday program also included Schubert's Fourth ("Tragic") Symphony and two modern compositions—Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City"—both composers being present to take the bows.

Munch Stars At Festival

B C. R. ROSEBERRY

A noble and triumphant performance of that greatest of all piano concertos, the Second Brahms, by Claudio Arrau and the Boston Symphony orchestra, was the highlight of the weekend music at Tanglewood with two programs in which contemporary works divided interest with standard concert favorites.

Rain and the threat of rain curtailed attendance in the category of "ground-admissions"—those devotees who take their chances on the broad lawns around the music shed. But the audiences were still tremendous. Saturday night's crowd was 8,900 (the sheltered seating capacity being 6,000) and only a brief rain actually fell during the concert.

Tanglewood Programs Are Revised; Plan Koussevitzky Memorial Pieces

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this Summer will be a sort of memorial to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, as it turns out, because of the sudden death of the great conductor who was planning to lead his Boston Symphony orchestra in several of the Festival concerts. Charles Munch, who succeeded Koussevitzky as symphony conductor last year, will lead most of the concerts originally scheduled to be conducted by Koussevitzky.

This will be Charles Munch's first season at Tanglewood. Now in Europe, he is returning to this country to be on hand for the opening July 7, and will be at the Festival for its duration, until Aug. 12.

The programs do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Hadyn-Mozart concerts in the Theatre-Concert hall and The Shed concerts of the closing week. Charles Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. The Final Chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the opening Bach Concert and Mozart's Funeral Music at the opening consert in The Shed, and has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethovens Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Ang. 5; otherwise the conserts will all be under the leadership of Mr. Munch.

The programs will be as follows: in the Theatre-Concert hall, July 7, Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Concerto in C Major For Three Pianos; Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; Final Chorus From the St. Matthew Passion; Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 6 and 4.

July 8, Bach: Cantata "Der Zufriedengestelite Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto in D Minor for Three iPanos; Magnificat. July 14, Hadyn: Symphony No. 88; Piano Concerto in D Major (Seymour Lipkin); Symphonie Concertante; Symphony No. 104 "London." July 15, Haydn: Symphony No. 103 "Drum Roll"; Vio- "Clock' and 92 "Oxford". July 21, loncello Concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphonies Nos. 101 Mozart: Symphony No. 35 "Haffner"; Missa Brevis, No. 192 (Hugh Ross conducting); Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Adagio and Fugue for Strings; Symphony No. 39 in E Flat. July 22, Mozart: Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns; Violin Concerto in A Major (William Kroll); Symphony No. 38 "Prague."

Programs in The Shed. Series A. July 28. Mozart: Funeral Music, K. 477; Schumann: Symphony No. 4; Berlioz: Fantastic Symphony. July 28. Weber: Overture to "Oberon"; Prokofieff; Symphony No. 6; Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2 (Claudio Arrau). July 29. Revised Plans For Tanglewood Are Announced

Special to The Blade

BOSTON—Revised plans for the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood have been announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Charles Munch, regular conductor of the Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and will return for the first week of the Festival July 7.

Mr. Munch will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall in addition to the two weeks of shed concerts already announced. He will conduct, also, the final week of concerts.

Eleazor de Carvalho will lead the concert Aug. 5 as planned and Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Benrstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, created by Dr. Koussevitzky at Tanglewood, will continue in accordance with plans announced. Mr. Bernstein, protege of Dr. Koussevitzky, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Aaron Copland, who has been at the American Academy in Rome this winter, will return in time for the school's opening exercises July 1. Mr. Munch has announced there will be little change in the programs planned originally by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Probably its most popular regular program will be broadcasts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. WGBH (standing for Great Blue Hill) will broadcast every symphony program of the season straight from Symphony hall, the first time this has been done in the Boston area since 1926. Its studios will also be located in the hall with auxiliary studios at Boston colleges.

The Lowell Institute Cooperative Broadcasting council is unique in radio. Its members are Boston college, Boston university, Harvard university, Lowell institute, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northeastern university, Tufts college, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, its newest recruit. The heads of those institutions are its trustees.

Since its organization in 1947 the council has won many awards for its work. Among them are the American College Public Relations award, and the George Foster Peabody Radio citation in 1948, and the Fourteenth American Exhibition of Educational Radio Programs first award for program dealing with personal and social programs in 1950.

Since 1947 the council, broadcasting over various Boston stations, has brought 1001 persons including 434 faculty members before its microphones.

Besides the symphony programs, WGBH will broadcast other concerts, folk music, plays by college dramatic groups, and recorded classroom lectures from the various colleges. It will, in fact, be possible for the FM listener to "go to college" over the radio. The new station will also feature special discussion on current events by leading authorities.

The engineering plans for the station are being made by representatives of Harvard and MIT. The transmitter itself has been presented to the council by Prof. E. H. Armstrong of Columbia university, one of the pioneers in frequency modulation.

Starting in the early fall some time (no definite date has been given for the first broadcast) WGBH will broadcast every day from 3 o'clock in the afternoon until 10:30 o'clock at night. On Fridays during the Symphony concert season it will go on the air at 2:15 o'clock in the afternoon. The station has been assigned a frequency of 89.7 megacycles by the FCC.

Munch Will Fill In For Koussevitzky

To Conduct at Tanglewood; Bernstein Back, Too

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will conduct all but one of the concerts originally planned for the late Serge Koussevitzky in this summer's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. This includes the six Bach, Haydn and Mozart concerts on Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, July 7 to 22, and the last two concerts of Series C with the full orchestra, Aug. 11 and 12. He has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Thursday evening, Aug. 9, as a memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky, who died last Tuesday. As originally scheduled, Mr. Munch will conduct the concerts of July 26, 28 and 29 and Aug. 2 and 4, and Eleazar De Carvalho will conduct the program of Sunday, Aug. 5. According to an announcement made yesterday in Boston, Mr. Munch will make as few changes as possible in the program planned by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky founded in Tanglewood in 1940, will continue according to plans already announced. Mr. Bernstein, who was a pupil of the late conductor, has returned from Mexico to take over his work in the school. Boris Goldovsky will conduct the performances of Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," on July 30 and 31, and the school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos." Aaron Copland, associate director, will return in time for the opening exercises July 1. Mr. Munch will close his curtailed European season at Strasbourg June 25 and will then return to the United States.

Tanglewood Notes

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning the first week of July to open the Berkshire festival at Tanglewood on July 7. He will conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theatre-concert hall, and in addition to the two weeks of shed concerts already announced will also conduct the final week of concerts. Eleazar De Carvalho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned, and Mr. Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, already scheduled for Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Music center has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" and the school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos."

There is no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments.

Berkshire Music Center

The Berkshire Music Center announces three concerts of chamber music through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The New Music String Quartet will open the series the evening of July 11, to be followed on succeeding Wednesday evenings at 8:15 by the Berkshire Trio on July 18 and the Trio Moyse July 25.

The New Quartet, whose members are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violin; Claus Adam, violincello; and Walter Trampler, a former Tanglewood student, will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C mapor by Beethoven.

The Berkshire Trio, composed of Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, both members of the Boston orchestra and the Music Center faculty; and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, will include early French music. They will play the Sonata in G (Antonio Lotti); Sonata in F (Benedetto Marcello); Sonata in C (Haendel); Sonata a trois (J. M. Leclair); Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise (Couperin) and Troisieme Concert (M.P. Rameau).

The Noyse Trio, whose players are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis, piano and flute; and his daughter-in-law, Blanche Honegger-Moyse, violin and viola, have selected Trio-Sonate en sol majeur (Bach); Duo pour 2 flutes (Haendel); Trio en ut (Haydn-Moyse); Husique en trio (Andre Thiriet); Trois Interludes (Ibert); Trois Petites Pieces en trio (Arthur Honegger); La Chanson pour 2 flutes et violon (Marcel Gennaro); Serenade pour 2 flutes et viola (Louise Moyse) and Trio-Sonate (Martinu).

The concerts will be open to students, friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public, as have other chamber music programs given through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Foundation each summer since 1946.

Esplanade Concerts Start Next Sunday

While conducting the closing week of the Pops, Arthur Fiedler will also be busy with preparations for his Esplanade Concerts. Next Sunday evening he will launch the twenty-third season of this series, at the Hatch Memorial shell, at the foot of Mt. Vernon street, with the usual large orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians. This season, the concerts will be held every night at 8:30, omitting Mondays, and the Children's Concerts will be shifted to Thursday mornings, at 10:15.

As usual, the maintenance of these concerts free of admission charge will depend on contributions to the Esplanade Concerts Fund, for which the Merchants National Bank, at its Copley square office, is again the voluntary depository. Contributions in advance of the season will be greatly appreciated.

A striking innovation this year will be a gala concert for the benefit of the fund, to be held at Fenway Park on Wednesday evening, July 11. Along with the Esplanade Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler will present guest stars. Mail orders are now being recieved at Symphony Hall for reserved tickets at $1 and $2, tax included. There also will be unreserved bleacher seats at 50 cents. Donors of $5 or more to the fund will receive invitations to sit in a special Patrons' Section.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this Summer will be a sort of memorial to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, as it turns out, because of the sudden death of the great conductor who was planning to lead his Boston Symphony orchestra in several of the Festival concerts. Charles Munch, who succeeded Koussevitzky as symphony conductor last year, will lead most of the concerts originally scheduled to be conducted by Koussevitzky.

This will be Charles Munch's first season at Tanglewood. Now in Europe, he is returning to this country to be on hand for the opening July 7, and will be at the Festival for its duration, until Aug. 12.

The programs do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Hadyn-Mozart concerts in the Theatre-Concert hall and The Shed concerts of the closing week. Charles Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. The Final Chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the opening Bach Concert and Mozart's Funeral Music at the opening consert in The Shed, and has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethovens Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Ang. 5; otherwise the conserts will all be under the leadership of Mr. Munch.

The programs will be as follows: in the Theatre-Concert hall, July 7, Bach, Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Concerto in C Major For Three Pianos; Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; Final Chorus From the St. Matthew Passion; Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 6 and 4.

July 8, Bach: Cantata "Der Zufriedengestelite Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto in D Minor for Three iPanos; Magnificat. July 14, Hadyn: Symphony No. 88; Piano Concerto in D Major (Seymour Lipkin); Symphonie Concertante; Symphony No. 104 "London." July 15, Haydn: Symphony No. 103 "Drum Roll"; Vio- "Clock' and 92 "Oxford". July 21, loncello, Concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphonies Nos. 101 Mozart: Symphony No. 35 "Haffner'; Missa Brevis, No. 192 (Hugh Ross conducting); Eine Kleine Nachtmusik; Adagio and Fugue for Strings; Symphony No. 39 in E Flat. July 22, Mozart: Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns; Violin Concerto in A Major (William Kroll); Symphony No. 38 "Prague."

Programs in The Shed. Series A. July 26. Mozart: Funeral Music, K. 477; Schumann: Symphony No. 4; Berlioz: Fantastic Symphony. July 28. Weber: Overture to "Oberon"; Prokofieff: Symphony No. 6; Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2 (Claudio Arrau). July 29. Barber: Overture "The School for Scandal"; Copland: "Quiet City'; Schubert: Symphony No. 4; Franck: Symphony in D Minor.

Series B. Aug. 2. Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva"; Beethoven: Symphony No. 6 "Pastorale;" Ravel: Rapsodie Espagnole; Roussel: Symphony No. 3. Aug. 4. Handel: Water Music: Bartok: Music for Strings and Percussion: Straus: Don Juan; Saint Saens: Symphony No. 3 with Organ. Aug. 5. Conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho. Guarnieri: Symphony No. 2: Prokofieff: Piano Concerto No. 2 (Jorge Bolet); Moussorgski-Ravel: "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Series C. Aug. 9. Conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Beethoven: Missa Solemnis. Aug. 11. Beethoven: Symphony No. 1; Honegger: Symphony No. 5: Tchiakovsky: Symphony No. 6 "Pathetique." Aug. 12. Brahms: Variations on a Theme by Haydn: Symphony No. 2; Symphony No. 4.

A Commemoration For Koussevitzky

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Although the death of Serge Koussevitzky will be commemorated on three programs of the coming Berkshire Festival, actually the whole season will be a memorial of the man who founded Tanglewood.

From July 7 to August 12, when the festival ends, the talk all over Tanglewood's beautiful countryside will be of the man who lived to see a childhood dream come true—the dream of a summer center of music where young and old might find annual solace and inspiration in the outdoor tabernacle of nature.

Charles Munch will conduct and Messrs. De Carvalho and Bernstein will be his podium guests. But the unseen hand leading the orchestra will be that of Serge Koussevitzky. The ideals and traditions he set will be respected by all. The warmest tribute to his memory will be the high level of performance achieved and maintained.

Works To Be Featured.

At the opening concert of the series in the Theater-Concert Hall—which is preliminary to the main concert series—Mr. Munch will feature the final chorus from Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" in observance of the death of his predecessor.

Thursday evening, July 26, he will open the first series of concerts in the large shed with Mozart's "Funeral Music" (K. 477), and as final homage to the beloved Master of Tanglewood, Mr. Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's great Mass on Thursday evening, August 9.

The opening series in the Theater-Concert Hall will run from July 7 to July 22, with concerts only on the two weekend days. Works of smaller scope by Bach, Haydn and Mozart will be performed at those concerts. All Thursday and Saturday evening concerts will start at 8:15; all Sunday afternoon concerts at 3.

Programs for the three major series in the Shed follow:

SERIES A.

THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 26—Mozart, Funeral Music K. 477 (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Schumann, Symphony No. 4; Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony.

SATURDAY EVENING, July 28.—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Prokofieff, Symphony No. 6; Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Claudio Arrau).

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, JULY 29—Barber, Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Copland, "Quiet City"; Schubert, Symphony No. 4; Franck, Symphony in D minor.

SERIES B.

THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 2—Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 6, "Pastorale"; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole; Roussel, Symphony No. 3.

SATURDAY EVENING, AUGUST 4—Handel, Water Music; Bartok, Music for Strings and Percussion; Strauss, Don Juan; Saint Saens, Symphony No. 3 with Organ.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, AUGUST 5 (Conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho)—Guarnieri, Symphony No. 2; Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Jorge Bolet); Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

SERIES C.

THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 9 (Conducted by Leonard Bernstein)—Beethoven, Missa Solemnis (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

SATURDAY EVENING, AUGUST 11—Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Honegger, Symphony No. 5; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique".

SUNDAY AFTERNOON, AUGUST 12—Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Symphony No. 2; Symphony No. 4.

Only One Phase.

The Berkshire Festival is only one phase of Tanglewood's musical life. Combined with it is the Berkshire Music Center, where students from everywhere enroll for all branches of musical instruction.

The school now boasts three orchestras and a chorus. There are workshops for composing and conducting, a section devoted to opera production, and special classes for music teachers. Numerous school performances are open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Anyone contributing to the Berkshire fund becomes a member.

Those seeking hotel or guest house accommodations for the festival are urged to write the Berkshire Hills Conference, Pittsfield, Mass., which has been promised the assistance of local chambers of commerce in trying to secure reservations.

Berkshire Festival Programs Announced

Programs have been announced by Charles Munch for all the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (July 7-Aug. 12).

They do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall and the Shed Concerts of the closing week.

Mr. Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the opening Bach concert and Mozart's Funeral Music at the opening concert in The Shed. He has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar De Carvalho will conduct on Aug. 5; otherwise the concerts will all be under the leadership of Mr. Munch.

The programs will be as follows: In the Theater-Concert Hall. July 7, Bach: Brandenburgh Concerto No. 3; Concerto in C Major for three pianos; Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; Final Chorus from the St. Matthew Passion; Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 6 and 4.

July 8, Bach: Cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto in D Minor for three pianos; Magnificat.

July 14, Haydn: Symphony No. 88; Piano Concerto in D Major (Seymour Lipkin); Symphonie Concertante; Symphony No. 104 "London."

July 15, Haydn: Symphony No. 103 "Drum Roll;" Violoncello Concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky); Symphonies Nos. 101 "Clock" and 92 "Oxford."

July 21, Mozart: Symphony No. 35 "Haffner;" Missa Brevis, K. 192 (Hugh Ross conducting); Eine Kleine Nachtmusix; Adagio and Fugure for Strings; Symphony No. 39 in E Flat.

July 22, Mozart: Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns; Violin Concerto in A Major (William Kroll); Symphony No. 38 "Prague."

Programs in The Shed. Series A, July 26, Mozart: Funeral Music, K. 477; Schumann: Symphony No. 4; Berlioz: Fantastic Symphony. July 28, Weber: Overture to "Oberon;" Prokofieff: Symphony No. 6; Brahms: Piano Concerto No. 2 (Claudio Arrau). July 29, Barber: Overture "The School for Scandal;" Copland: "Quiet City;" Schubert: Symphony No. 4; Franck: Symphony in D Minor.

Series B, Aug. 2. Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva;" Beethoven: Symphony No. 6 "Pastorale;" Ravel: Rapsodie Espagnole; Roussel: Symphony No. 3. Aug. 4, Handel: Water Music; Bartok: Music for Strings and Percussion; Strauss: Don Juan; Saint Saens: Symphony No. 3 with organ; Aug. 5, conducted by Eleazar De Carvalho. Guarnieri: Symphony No. 2; Prokofieff: Piano Concerto No. 2 (Jorge Bolet); Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures At An Exhibition."

Series C, Aug. 9 Conducted by Leonard Bernstein. Beethoven: Missa Solemnis. Aug. 11, Beethoven: Symphony No. 1; Honegger: Symphony No. 5; Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 6 "Pathetique." Aug. 12, Brahms: Variations on a Theme by Haydn: Symphony No. 2; Symphony No. 4.

TWELVE-TONE COMPOSER

Dallapiccola, in First Visit to This Country, Will Teach at Berkshire Center

By HAROLD C. SCHONBERG

THE minor seismic disturbance observed in this city a week or so ago was caused by a little Italian composer briefly passing through on his way to the Berkshire Summer School in Tanglewood, where he is now engaged in teaching composition to a hand-picked group of about eight students.

He is Luigi Dallapiccola, whose opera "Il Prigioniero" was heard here last season. Mr. Dallapiccola is somewhat of an anomaly among Italian composers. Born in the land that produced Rossini, Donizetti, Verdi, he writes music in the twelve-tone idiom and is the only Italian composer who has attracted international comment for his scores in that medium.

Mr. Dallapiccola, whose English is not yet too fluent but whose French, German and Italian are, was largely accompanied by Howard Shanet during his short stay in New York. Mr. Shanet, a faculty member of Tanglewood and the late Serge Koussevitzky's assistant, had met the Italian composer last year in Florence, where he is Professor of Piano at the Cherubini Conservatory.

"But not advanced pianists," said Mr. Dallapiccola, in a fair-minded effort to keep the record straight. "Beginners who have to take required courses." He chortled. "I also should say that I never before have taught a formal course in composition. When Mr. Aaron Copland approached me for the course I told him this and asked him to think it over."

Sunny Italy

Seated over a coffee table, Mr. Dallapiccola popped a piece of cube sugar into his mouth and contentedly sucked it. With his classic Italian characteristics, he could serve as an illustration for Sunny Italy. He is short, slim, sharp of features, with a narrow face, prominent nose, iron-gray hair and an excitable, bubbling temperament. While speaking he constantly uses his hands in excitable, voluble gestures. Much laughter punctuates his conversation. His age is 47 and he looks much younger.

It was in 1924, he said, that the twelve-tone idiom hit him. That was the première in Florence of Schoenberg's "Pierrot Lunaire."

"Only two people in the hall were impressed by the music. One was a very unimportant young man. Me. The other was Giacomo Puccini. Schoenberg has never forgotten the praise that Puccini gave him."

For the most part, Dallapiccola studied Schoenberg's technique by himself. He analyzed his scores, and those of Webern and Berg. Then, he said, he started reading Proust and Joyce (in French translation), finding a close parallel between such works as "Ulysses" and "Remembrance of Things Past" and the twelve-tone system.

As for his Tanglewood classes, he went up there with no preconceived notions. It all depends on the students, he says.

Living Laboratory

What he would like to do, if possible, is to use his own work as what he calls a "living laboratory" for teaching composition. He has been commissioned to compose a work—it will be a violin concerto — for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, and he would like to bring his own problems to the class. In that way the students will see the problems an experienced composer is up against.

Despite reports to the contrary, Mr. Dallapiccola has never ceased being a twelve-tone composer. "Strict twelve-tone?" he was asked. He looked severe.

"The word 'strict' does not exist in art," he said. "I have read with great satisfaction that Schoenberg, when he composes, is rather an artist than a theoretician."

When Mr. Dallapiccola thinks of a theme, he claims, he can create it in only twelve tones. He does admit, though, that he has been constantly trying to become more stringent in his application of them and cites his religious play, "Job," as an example.

On the night of his arrival in America, he and Mr. Shanet took a trip around town. Mr. Dallapiccola was speechless: too moved even to express himself. He had seen the city on films, but the reality, the essence, overpowered him. And so he fell back upon his favorite Dante. Dante makes Virgil say, "Sappi che non son torri, ma giganti"—"know ye that these are not towers, but giants." Says Mr. Dallapiccola: "Sappi che sono torri, non giganti."

A Commemoration For Koussevitzky

By LOUIS BIANCOLLI.

Although the death of Serge Koussevitzky will be commemorated on three programs of the coming Berkshire Festival, actually the whole season will be a memorial of the man who founded Tanglewood.

From July 7 to August 12, when the festival ends, the talk all over Tanglewood's beautiful countryside will be of the man who lived to see a childhood dream come true—the dream of a summer center of music where young and old might find annual solace and inspiration in the outdoor tabernacle of nature.

Charles Munch will conduct and Messrs. De Carvalho and Bernstein will be his podium guests. But the unseen hand leading the orchestra will be that of Serge Koussevitzky. The ideals and traditions he set will be respected by all. The warmest tribute to his memory will be the high level of performance achieved and maintained.

Works To Be Featured.

At the opening concert of the series in the Theater-Concert Hall —which is preliminary to the main concert series—Mr. Munch will feature the final chorus from Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" in observance of the death of his predecessor.

Thursday evening, July 26, he will open the first series of concerts in the large shed with Mozart's "Funeral Music" (K. 477), and as final homage to the beloved Master of Tanglewood, Mr. Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's great Mass on Thursday evening, August 9.

The opening series in the Theater-Concert Hall will run from July 7 to July 22, with concerts only on the two weekend days. Works of smaller scope by Bach, Haydn and Mozart will be performed at those concerts. All Thursday and Saturday evening concerts will start at 8:15; all Sunday afternoon concerts at 3.

Programs for the three major series in the Shed follow:

SERIES A.

THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 26—Mozart, Funeral Music K. 477 (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Schumann, Symphony No. 4; Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony.
SATURDAY EVENING, July 28.—Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Prokofieff, Symphony No. 6; Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Claudio Arrau).
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, JULY 29—Barber, Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Coplan, "Quiet City"; Schubert, Symphony No. 4; Franck, Symphony in D minor.

SERIES B.

THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 2—Schumann, Overture to "Genoveva"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 6, "Pastorale"; Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole; Roussel, Symphony No. 3.
SATURDAY EVENING, AUGUST 4—Handel, Water Music; Bartok, Music for Strings and Percussion; Strauss, Don Juan; Saint Saens, Symphony No. 3, with Organ.
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, AUGUST 5 (Conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho)—Guarnieri, Symphony No. 2; Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Jorge Bolet); Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

SERIES C.

THURSDAY EVENING, AUGUST 9 (Conducted by Leonard Bernstein)—Beethoven, Missa Solemnis (In memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.
SATURDAY EVENING, AUGUST 11—Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Honegger, Symphony No. 5; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6, "Pathetique".
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, AUGUST 12—Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Symphony No. 2, Symphony No. 4.

Only One Phase.

The Berkshire Festival is only one phase of Tanglewood's musical life. Combined with it is the Berkshire Music Center, where students from everywhere enroll for all branches of musical instruction.

The school now boasts three orchestras and a chorus. There are workshops for composing and conducting, a section devoted to opera production, and special classes for music teachers. Numerous school performances are open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Anyone contributing to the Berkshire fund becomes a member.

Those seeking hotel or guest house accommodations for the festival are urged to write the Berkshire Hills Conference, Pittsfield, Mass., which has been promised the assistance of local chambers of commerce in trying to secure reservations.

Student Orchestra Concert Tomorrow

Richard Burgin, concert master and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and students of conducting, will lead the symphonic orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center in the first of five weekly concerts in the music shed at Tanglewood tomorrow evening. Students will conduct the first half, Mr. Burgin the second, of the following program:

Symphony No. 2 in C minor .... Mahler
(One movement.)
Don Juan, a tone poem after Nicholaus Levan ..... Strauss
Piano Concerto No. 4 in G major, Beethoven
(Tow movements.)
Symphony No. 3 in F major .... Brahms

The concert will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Voluntary contributions to the organization, which helps to support the school, constitute membership and are received in the Friends office at Tanglewood.

Robert Coleman In Concert Sunday At Tanglewood

Robert Coleman

TANGLEWOOD—Robert M. Coleman, formerly of Pittsfield, son of Mrs. Donald L. Coleman of 44 Thomson Place, will play the viola part in the Dvorak quintet in A major that will conclude the chamber music concert at Tanglewood Sunday morning at 10.30. The program will be the first of a weekly series of five that will be given on Sunday mornings by students in the chamber music section of the Berkshire Music Center under the direction of Gregor Piatigorsky and William Kroll.

On the faculty of the department are Jean Bedetti, former cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the school; Fernand Gillet, Miss Ruth Posselt and members of the Boston orchestra.

The program will include Beethoven's Ghost trio with Bernard George Muller of Schaffhausen, Switzerland, violin; Marti Knauer, Indianapolis, cello; and Joseph Rezits of Champaign, Ill., piano; Haydn's quartet, Opus 76 (the Sunrise Quartet) with Joanne Dempsey of Seattle, Wash., first violin; Elaine Lee, Pittsburgh, Pa., second violin; Barbara Hill, Miami, Fla., viola; and John O. Kettle, also of Miami, cello.

The parts in the quintet will be played by Sonia Faigen of Pittsburgh, first violin; Edwin Grzesnikowski, Philadelphia, second violin; Mr. Coleman, viola; Eugene Zallo, cello; and Edith Grosz, piano.

Four From County Will Study At Tanglewood

Four Berkshire County musicians have enrolled for the ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. With 360 others, who represent 33 states and 11 countries, they will study for six weeks, beginning July 1 "on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance." The preliminary registration of the school, held in connection with the annual Berkshire Festival which Charles Munch, music director of the Boston orchestra will open July 7, exceeds by more than 100 that of this time last year, with 10 more days before the closing of the list.

The local students are Robert M. Coleman, now of New York City, son of Mrs. Donald L. Coleman of 44 Thomson Place and the late Mr. Coleman, Joseph Pizzonia of 8 Lyric Street, Pittsfield; Frederick W. Lord of 75 Lewis Street, Great Barrington, and Miss Clarissa Cardillo of North Adams. Mr. Coleman, who holds a A.B. degree from the Juilliard School of Music, New York City, is a graduate of Pittsfield High School. He has been on tour for three months with the Robert Shaw Chorale orchestra as first viola. A former student of Miss Kathleen Parlow and Conrad Held of the South Mountain Quartet and former Mary E. Jones, director of the Pittsfield Community Music School, he has played with the Mozart Chamber Orchestra, and the Stokowski "All-Star" Orchestra.

Mr. Pizzonia, a basoon player, studied at the New England Conservatory of Music after graduating from Pittsfield High School. He has played with the Rhode Island Philharmonic Orchestra, Providence, the Albany Orchestra and the Central Florida Symphony Orchestra in Tampa. This season will be his fourth at Tanglewood.

Mr. Lord is a graduate of Searles High School and Dartmouth College. He has sung as tenor soloist with the Dartmouth glee club and with the Handel Society Chorus the Dartmouth Madrigal Singers and the White Church choir.

A TRADITION IN BOSTON

Pops, Originated in 1885, Still Going Strong

By CARTER HARMAN

BOSTON UNIVERSITY is honoring one of the Hub city's favorite sons tomorrow evening, when it will confer an honorary Doctor of Music degree on Arthur Fiedler. The presentation will take place during the broadcast of the Boston Pops Orchestra, which Mr. Fiedler has led for twenty-one seasons.

He has held the post longer than any conductor now heading an American symphony orchestra, so long that his history and that of the organization have almost become one. The fact is, he founded the free Esplanade concerts, which take place on the Embankment of the Charles River, in 1929, and his numerous activities include the astonishing number of about 260 recordings with the orchestra. He also makes numerous guest appearances, such as the one he will make here on June 16, when he conducts the Philharmonic-Symphony in "Music Under the Stars" at Ebbets Field.

But Boston claims to have invented the pops-concert idea long before Mr. Fiedler's time. It began there, they say, sixty-six years ago, when the parent orchestra — the Boston Symphony — was only four years old. A writer of that time refers to the pleasant programs which mixed "the grave and the gay" and yet avoided "heaviness or triviality." And today's programs are still of a nature to blend with a beer and a cigarette.

Typical Programs

Three weeks ago, for instance, the program included the prelude to "Carmen," the overture to "Russlan and Ludmilla," "The Moldau," and the "Polovetzian Dances" as well as "Jazz Legato and Jazz Pizzicato" and "Fiddle Faddle."

A history of the series assigns the word "popular" as the father of the word "pops" but admits the possibility that the latter may have derived from the popping of corks that accompanied the music. A Minuet by Bolzoni, played fifty years ago, carried a special request for the audience to "preserve silence during its performance."

A typical program of the late Nineties listed a Sousa march, selections from "Faust," the "Phèdre" overture, ballet music from "Coppelia" and assorted waltzes, polkas and "mazourkas."

Advertisements in the old program books emphasized the pleasures of the moment; there was an overwhelming majority of notices for liquid refreshments in the pages. On a representative week today beverages still lead the field but listeners are urged to enjoy music at home too by buying pianos, radio-phonographs, music.

Early Description

A man who wandered in to one of the early concerts wrote an enthusiastic letter describing the event. After mentioning the high musical value of the performance he described the scene:

"There was a great crowd there, and of good class. The floor and balcony were filled with tables, four chairs to each, and beer and wine and cigars were served. Everyone seemed to be happy, particularly when the orchestra opened up one part with 'The Star-Spangled Banner'—and all stood up and sang."

The extraordinary success of these events testifies to the vigor of their administration as well as to the high quality of the orchestra itself. There is a list of about 100 local clubs, colleges, churches, hospitals, associations and corporations which hold reservations. As for the musicians, the spring series just about fills out their working year: the Boston Symphony plays from October to April; the pops orchestra plays in Symphony Hall during May and June; the Esplanade concerts are given during July, and in August the symphony has its busman's holiday at the Berkshire Festival.

Programs Are Announced At Berkshire

THE programs are announced by Charles Munch for all the concerts of the Berkshire festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (July 7-Aug. 12). Mr. Munch, the orchestra music director, will bring to an end his European engagements to return and make his first appearance at Tanglewood. The programs do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall and the Shed concerts by the closing week.

Mr. Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, the final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" at the opening Bach concert and Mozart's funeral music at the opening concert in the Shed, and has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" and on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitsky. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Aug. 5; otherwise the concerts will all be under the leadership of Mr. Munch.

The programs will be as follows:

In the Theater-Concert hall, July 2. Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; concerto in C Major for three pianos; Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion; Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 5 and 4. July 3. TANGLEWOOD

Tanglewood, a mountain holiday, summer study for gifted students, and one of America's most glamorous music festivals. The gree lawn outside the opera house is a pleasant place to listen to music.

At the western end of Massachusetts, in the pretty towns of Lenox and Stockbridge, lies Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate that is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tanglewood—once the meeting place of Ralph Waldo Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Herman Melville. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived there in 1850-51, and there created his "Tanglewood Tales."

Today, for six weeks each summer Tanglewood echoes music from morning till night. It houses a music school whose instructors are first-chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a musical festical performed by the orchestra. Both are under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, music director emeritus of the Boston Symphony and Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

This year the school will be in session from July 3 to Aug. 13. The festival will take place July 6-23. Audiences that gather to hear this program of music will come from all parts of the United States, Canada and Mexico. Those who drive find the approach to Tanglewood a simple one. Tanglewood is less than two miles from the intersection of two main north-south and east-west highways, U. S. Routes 7 and 20. It has mainline connections by train to New York, Boston and Chicago, and by air to Albany and Springfield.

Thanks to the tricky acoustics of the shed, which holds 6000 and was designed by Finland's famed architect Eliel Saarinen, it is possible to hear the music without loss of clarity at astonishing distances. The shed was built to replace the original tent in which Berkshire Festival concerts took place in the early days. An all-Wagner concert which was played in the tent during a violent thunderstorm proved to be the last straw. Dr. Koussevitzky went on strike, announcing he would conduct no more at the Festival until a suitable place for hearing music was created.

The Berkshire Festival was established in 1934, with Henry Hadley, American composer-conductor, directing 65 members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. At Hadley's death, it was decided to invite Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony to take part.

Friends of the Berkshire Festival are nettled by references to the event as an "American Salzburg." They point out that its combination of summer study and professional concerts is unique. In fact, the comparison, they suggest, might be the other way around.

A Minuet by Bolzoni, played fifty years ago, carried a special request for the audience to "preserve silence during its performance."

A typical program of the late Nineties listed a Sousa march, selections from "Faust," the "Phèdre" overture, ballet music from "Coppelia" and assorted waltzes, polkas and "mazourkas."

Advertisements in the old program books emphasized the pleasures of the moment; there was an overwhelming majority of notices for liquid refreshments in the pages. On a representative week today beverages still lead the field but listeners are urged to enjoy music at home too by buying pianos, radio-phonographs, music.

Early Description

A man who wandered in to one of the early concerts wrote an enthusiastic letter describing the event. After mentioning the high musical value of the performance he describea the scene:

"There was a great crowd there, and of good class. The floor and balcony were filled with tables, four chairs to each, and beer and wine and cigars were served. Everyone seemed to be happy, particularly when the orchestra opened up one part with 'The Star-Spangled Banner'—and all stood up and sang."

The extraordinary success of these events testifies to the vigor of their administration as well as to the high quality of the orchestra itself. There is a list of about 100 local clubs, colleges, churches, hospitals, associations and corporations which hold reservations. As for the musicians, the spring series just about fills out their working year: the Boston Symphony plays from October to April; the pops orchestra plays in Symphony Hall during May and June; the Esplanade concerts are given during July, and in August the symphony has its busman's holiday at the Berkshire Festival.

Munch, Bernstein Step in at Tanglewood

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has curtailed his European engagements and is returning the first week of July to open the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood on July 7. He will conduct the Bach-Hayden-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall. In addition to the two weeks of shed concerts already announced he also will conduct the final week of concerts.

Eleazar De Carvalho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned, and Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis already scheduled for Thursday evening, Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Minimum of Change Planned At Tanglewood

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood July 7, conducting the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the Theater-Concert hall. He will also take over the assignments of the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in the Music Shed, including the final week.

Leonard Bernstein has been invited to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" scheduled for Thursday evening, Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Bernstein, who had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitsky's work in the Berkshire Music Center school.

Mr. Munch, who will end his curtailed European concert season tomorrow at Strasbourg, has sent word that there will be a minimum of change in the programs originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Programs Are Announced At Berkshire

THE programs are announced by Charles Munch for all the concerts of the Berkshire festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood (July 7-Aug. 12). Mr. Munch, the orchestra music director, will bring to an end his European engagements to return and make his first appearance at Tanglewood. The programs do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall and the Shed concerts by the closing week.

Mr. Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, the final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" at the opening Bach concert and Mozart's funeral music at the opening concert in the Shed, and has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" and on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitsky. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Aug. 5; otherwise the concerts will all be under the leadership of Mr. Munch.

The programs will be as follows:

In the Theater-Concert hall, July 2. Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; concerto in C Major for three pianos; Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion; Brandenburg Concertos Nos. 6 and 4. July 8. MUSIC SCHOOL LISTS 364

Pupils From 11 Nations to Attend Course at Berkshire Center

With a little more than a week to go until the opening on July 2 of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., thirty-three states and eleven countries already are represented among the 364 students who have enrolled for the six-week course. This exceeds by more than a hundred the equivalent enrollment a year ago.

Foreign countries represented include Canada, Israel, Holland, Cuba, Norway, Italy, Egypt, Brazil, Mexico and Switzerland.

The school is held in conjunction with the annual Berkshire Festival, which Charles Munch will open on July 7 with the first of three week-end programs featuring the music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart. The three week-ends of the festival in the main music shed will be inaugurated on July 26.

MUSICAL Majors & Minors
by Dan Hales

TANGLEWOOD

Tanglewood, a mountain holiday, summer study for gifted students, and one of America's most glamorous music festivals. The gree lawn outside the opera house is a pleasant place to listen to music.

At the western end of Massahcusetts, in the pretty towns of Lenox and Stockbridge, lies Tanglewood, the 210-acre estate that is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Tanglewood was once the meeting place of Ralph Waldo Emerson, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Herman Melville. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived there in 1850-51, and there created his "Tanglewood Tales."

Today, for six weeks each summer Tanglewood echoes music from morning till night. It houses a music school whose instructors are first-chair men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and a musical festical performed by the orchestra. Both are under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky, music director emeritus of the Boston Symphony and Director of the Berkshire Music Center.

This year the school will be in session from July 3 to Aug. 13. The festival will take place July 6-23. Audiences that gather to hear this program of music will come from all parts of the United States, Canada and Mexico. Those who drive find the approach to Tanglewood a simple one. Tanglewood is less than two miles from the intersection of two main north-south and east-west highways, U. S. Routes 7 and 20. It has mainline connections by train to New York, Boston and Chicago, and by air to Albany and Springfield.

Thanks to the tricky acoustics of the shed, which holds 6000 and was designed by Finland's famed architect Eliel Saarinen, it is possible to hear the music without loss of clarity at astonishing distances. The shed was built to replace the original tent in which Berkshire Festival concerts took place in the early days. An all-Wagner concert which was played in the tent during a violent thunderstorm proved to be the last straw. Dr. Koussevitzky went on strike, announcing he would conduct no more at the Festival until a suitable place for hearing music was created.

The Berkshire Festival was established in 1934, with Henry Hadley, American composer-conductor, directing 65 members of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony. At Hadley's death, it was decided to invite Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony to take part.

Friends of the Berkshire Festival are nettled by references to the event as an "American Salzburg." They point out that its combination of summer study and professional concerts is unique. In fact, the comparison, they suggest, might be the other way around.

Koussevitzky Honored At Berkshire Opening

By EMMA VAN WORMER

TANGLEWOOD—The Berkshire Music Center opened here yesterday with a dedication to the ideals and dreams of the founder, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whose magic in the universe of music was responsible for the fashioning of "Tanglewood" as it has been for a quarter of a century in keeping the Boston Symphony Orchestra among first orchestras of the world.

There was a moment of silence by the nearly 400 music center students, and the many friends of the Berkshire Music Center, as the program opened in the theater-concert hall.

Dr. Lewis Perry, president of the center, greeting Mme. Koussevitzky, faculty members, students and friends, emphasized the perfection demanded by Dr. Koussevitsky and the latter's belief that religion and music were one.

THE REV. DR. THEODORE PARKER FERRIS, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony, spoke of the reasons to give thanks for Dr. Koussevitsky's inestimable gifts to music, of his high purposes, his sense of the dramatic and his capacities for giving a music-hungry people music of many ages and many lands.

Leonard Bernstein, the young conductor whose studies and friendship with the late Dr. Koussevitzy, extended over a decade, spoke with deep feeling of that combination he possessed of personal example and dynamic contact—which is the manner of all great teaching. He (Bernstein) will take over the orchestral and conducting department in the center, assisted by Richard Burgin, Boston Symphony concert master; Eleazar De Carvalho (who conducted the Israel Philharmonic in Syracuse last winter, and Seymour Lipkin, pianist, a new member of the faculty.

HUGH ROSS, head of the center choral conducting and chorus, conducted Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," the student body singing the soaring music with fine effect. Among several noted musicians introduced was Liugi Dallapiccola, recently arrived from Italy, to be instructor in composition during the six weeks term.

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony, who arrived in Boston yesterday by plane from Europe will motor to Tanglewood today, accompanied by George E. Judd, business manager of the orchestra. Director Munch will conduct the six concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra members in the theater-concert hall, bach-Hayden-Mozart programs, beginning next Saturday night and continuing through Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons through July 22. He also will conduct several programs in the three concert series in the Shed beginning July 26 through Aug. 12.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Beethoven Missa.

Memorial Music to Dr. Koussevitzky In 'Tanglewood'

CHARLES MUNCH, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass., this summer. The selections: The Final Chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the opening Bach Concert July 7, in the Theater-Concert Hall, and Mozart's Funeral Music at the opening concert in The Shed July 26. Director Munch has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

THE AUG. 5 concert of the Berkshire Festival in The Shed will be conducted by Eleazar De Carvalho. The program will include the Guarnieri Symphony No. 2; the Prokofieff Piano Concerto No. 2, with Jorge Bolet, soloist, and "Pictures at An Exhibition," Moussorgsky-Ravel.

FESTIVAL PROGRAMS do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Dr. Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall and The Shed concerts of the Festival closing week. Other concerts all will be under leadership of Munch.

HUGH ROSS will conduct the Bach Cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" July 8; Seymour Lipkin, who played with the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra here two seasons ago, will appear in the Theater-Concert Hall the night of July 14, to play the Haydn Piano Concerto in D Major; Gregor Piatigorsky will play the Violoncello Concerto by Haydn, July 15 and on July 22, William Kroll will play the Mozart Violin Concerto in A Major. These July concerts are in the Theater-Concert Hall.

IN THE SHED, soloists will include Claudio Arrau, pianist, to appear with the orchestra in the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2. In Berkshire Music Center, created by Serge Koussevitzky, is a major part of the activity in Tanglewood. There are three orchestras in the school, a chorus and departments for composing, opera and chamber music.

Ninth Season Opens At Tanglewood

The ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, opens this week as Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrive to prepare for their initial concerts, next Saturday and Sunday, of music by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Serge Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church in Boston, Mass., and Trustee of the Orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work tomorrow in each of the five departments. The first of more than 30 musical events performed by the students will take place on Friday evening, July 6, with a concert by the student symphony orchestra, performing in the Music Shed. The popular Sunday morning student chamber music recitals and the weekly Composers' Forums will also begin next week. These concerts, and the others, will be attended by Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, and by other students. Last year the total attendance at such student events exceeded 50,000.

Tanglewood

Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra . . . where concert time finds hundreds taking their music al fresco

TANGLEWOOD is being readied for another active summer season. Each year that simple statement recalls a pleasant experience to thousands of persons who have visited this unique summer home of fine music to listen or to take part. The generosity of many who love music, and the energetic support of distinguished musicians have made Tanglewood possible, and as it has developed, Tanglewood has created in the heart of Western Massachusetts a tradition of quality and taste; in so doing, it has become famous.

Today it is almost taken as a matter of course that for six weeks in July and August one may go to Lenox, Massachusetts and hear concerts there performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But while thousands of persons attend most of the sixty-odd events at Tanglewood during a normal season now, it is less than fifteen years since the Boston Symphony Orchestra first acquired its home on the spacious Tanglewood estate, and performed its first concerts under a tent hired for the occasion.

Tanglewood is an estate of more than two hundred acres situated between Lenox and Stockbridge, which was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the winter of 1936, after three summers of concerts by its members and those from the New York Philharmonic had convinced Berkshire County residents that having symphonic music at hand during a summer was, from every angle, a wonderful idea. During the next year a nonprofit corporation was formed and was able to obtain sufficient subscriptions to erect a permanent structure for performances. Known as the Music Shed, this modernistic, wedge-shaped auditorium combined superlative acoustics with a much desired suitability to the rustic atmosphere of the old estate. Since its completion it has earned much deserved praise for its success, and its 6000 seats are usually filled at concert-time, with the surrounding lawns used by additional hundreds who take their music al fresco, surprisingly undiminished in fidelity. It is this Shed in which the nine Berkshire Festival concerts are performed as well as the weekly student symphony orchestra performances.

In 1941 a smaller but similar auditorium, the Theater-Concert Hall seating 1100, was added, and has since then been used for the series of July week-end con-

Ninth Season Opens At Tanglewood

The ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood opens this week as Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrive to prepare for their initial concerts, next Saturday and Sunday, of music by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Serge Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church in Boston, Mass., and Trustee of the Orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work tomorrow in each of the five departments. The first of more than 30 musical events performed by the students will take place on Friday evening, July 6, with a concert by the student symphony orchestra, performing in the Music Shed. The popular Sunday morning student chamber music recitals and the weekly Composers' Forums will also begin next week. BERKSHIRE — The programs are announced by Charles Munch for the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, July 7-August 12. Mr. Munch, the orchestra's musical director, brings to an end his European engagements to return in time for his first appearance at Tanglewood. The programs do not differ greatly from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall and the Shed Concerts on the closing week. Mr. Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; the final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" on Saturday evening, July 7, and Mozart's "Funeral Music," on Thursday evening, July 26. Leonard Bernstein will conduct the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on August 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on August 5.

Cottage in lower left corner is a replica of the cottage occupied by Nathaniel Hawthorne during 1851-53, where "Tanglewood Tales," "The Wonder Book," and "The House of Seven Gables" were planned and begun. The National Federation of Music Clubs presented this replica to the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1948; today it is used for studios by the Music Center.

2. Chamber Music Hall, where, each Sunday morning during the six-weeks' season, students give a recital of works studied during the week.

4. The formal gardens at Tanglewood, which serve as the location for opera presentations by members of the Berkshire Music Center Opera Department. Scenes from operas are given several times during the six-weeks' season, in addition to a major operatic production which is performed in the Theatre-Concert Hall.

certs of music by Bach and Mozart, performed by the principal members of the Orchestra under Music Director Charles Munch. These performances of the old masters sparkle with artistry and have been so popular that an additional series of concerts of music by Haydn has been planned for this summer.

But the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the only performing group in this remarkable spot. More than four hundred young musicians come to a school founded by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in 1940, the Berkshire Music Center, for the six weeks. This school is designed primarily as a practical workshop for students well along in their development and the performances of the various departments are occasions on which they show their growing mastery of their craft. These concerts and recitals number more than forty in one season, and are attended in sizable numbers by members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, who contribute to the support of the school and its purposes. But while attendance at student concerts seems a reward to the Friends, it also is valuable in giving the young musicians their much sought-after chance to be heard.

The student body of more than four hundred is divided into departments, the instruction in each varying with the need, but always under the guidance of musicians, themselves notable in the field. Gregor Piatigorsky and William Kroll, for instance, head the chamber music group; Boris Goldovsky supervises the opera department; Hugh Ross of the Schola Cantorum directs the chorus and choral conductors; and Aaron Copland is resident composition instructor, along with Luigi Dallapiccola, visiting from Italy this summer. Each summer some composer of note comes to help young composers, and to exchange ideas about the writing of music in the modern idiom; in past years they have included Darius Milhaud, Samuel Barber, Arthur Honegger, Jacques Ibert, and Olivier Messiaen. Principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra also give instruction in their specialties, and heading the school and the conducting students this year, is Charles Munch.

certs of music by Bach and Mozart, performed by the principal members of the Orchestra under Music Director Charles Munch. These performances of the old masters sparkle with artistry and have been so popular that an additional series of concerts of music by Haydn has been planned for this summer.

But the Boston Symphony Orchestra is not the only performing group in this remarkable spot. More than four hundred young musicians come to a school founded by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in 1940, the Berkshire Music Center, for the six weeks. This school is designed primarily as a practical workshop for students well along in their development and the performances of the various departments are occasions on which they show their growing mastery of their craft. These concerts and recitals number more than forty in one season, and are attended in sizable numbers by members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, who contribute to the support of the school and its purposes. But while attendance at student concerts seems a reward to the Friends, it also is valuable in giving the young musicians their much sought-after chance to be heard.

The student body of more than four hundred is divided into departments, the instruction in each varying with the need, but always under the guidance of musicians, themselves notable in the field. Gregor Piatigorsky and William Kroll, for instance, head the chamber music group; Boris Goldovsky supervises the opera department; Hugh Ross of the Schola Cantorum directs the chorus and choral conductors; and Aaron Copland is resident composition instructor, along with Luigi Dallapiccola, visiting from Italy this summer. Each summer some composer of note comes to help young composers, and to exchange ideas about the writing of music in the modern idiom; in past years they have included Darius Milhaud, Samuel Barber, Arthur Honegger, Jacques Ibert, and Olivier Messiaen. Principals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra also give instruction in their specialties, and heading the school and the conducting students this year, is Charles Munch.

Berkshire Festival Opens— 'Kon-Tiki' as It Co

Munch Conducts First Pair Of Concerts at Tanglewood

By Paul Giuliana

Lenox, Mass.

Several thousands gathered here at Tanglewood Saturday evening for the opening concert of the annual Berkshire Festival in the Theater-Concert Hall. With the inclusion of the final chorus from the Bach "Passion According to St. Matthew" sung by the Tanglewood Chorus, the program took on the aspects of a memorial concert to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the Berkshire Center. Charles Munch conducted the small orchestra in four of the Brandenburg Concerti, Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 6, and the Concerto in C Major for three pianos and strings with Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz, and Bernard Zighera as soloists.

A sometime prevalent misconception that the music of Bach is merely intellectually contrapuntal exercise seems by now to be nearly dissipated, judging by the eager response to Mr. Munch's interpretations of the movements in the several concerti. Although the opening movement of the Brandenburg No. 3 lacked the precision in ensemble so conspicuously present in the remainder of the program, before the end of the second movement Mr. Munch and his musicians found that intimate rapport in tempo which they maintained throughout the rest of the concert.

If one were to point out peaks in an evening crowded with periods of high expression, mention might be made of the serenity in the long flowing phrases in the Andante movement of No. 4 with Richard Burgin, violin, Georges Laurent and George Madsen, flutes, in the concertino parts. The smooth figurations of the violin and the purity and agility of the flute tones were dynamically beautiful.

A truly amazing performance was given by Roger Voisin on the high trumpet in Concerto No. 2. It was Dr. Koussevitzky who discovered Mr. Voisin's extraordinary ability on the small trumpet for this concerto. He has been given the assignment ever since. He could not have played it better than during this memorial concert on Saturday evening. Not only were the difficult figures executed impeccably in an amazing feat of virtuosity but the playing was musical, with the main emphasis placed on the dynamic expression.

In the seldom-heard concerto for three keyboards, Bach has contrived the musical texture so that at no time is there a ponderous thickness in the sonority in the three movements. In fact, at times on Saturday evening, the instrumental background tended to overshadow the clarity in the wealth of detail between the pianos. Balance and control gave the rewarding interpretation dignity and beauty indicated by the music. Mr. Munch and the soloists received an ovation.

Before the performance of the St. Matthew Passion chorus, Mr. Munch spoke a few words of tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky, inviting the audience to rise after the singing for a moment of silence.

For the Sunday afternoon concert Hugh Ross conducted Bach's secular cantata, "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus." In this short programistic drama, composed in honor of Dr. A. F. Müller, are depicted mythical deities of the seasons in a delightful interchange sung by the four soloists: Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Mr. Pease as Aeolus sang the dramatic role in a richly resonant bass voice, executing the difficult leaps and scale passages with remarkable agility and accurate intonation. During the supplicatory singing of Pomona's aria by Eunice Alberts the pastoral melodies of the slightly melancholy oboe d'amore were beautifully played by Louis Speyer.

The lesser roles of Zephyrus, Pomona, and Pallas Athena were musically interpreted and mingled with the descriptive orchestral color to round out a delightful performance of one of Bach's less-known secular works. Mr. Ross, who prepares the choruses at Tanglewood, conducted with energy and understanding of the stylistic aspects of the music.

It is probably true that Bach composed the two concerti for three keyboards for himself and two sons. In the D Minor Concerto the first piano—presumably to be played by himself—has the major part of the main theme material. The second and third pianos are far from idle, however, and throughout the three movements there is a wealth of melodic invention and delightful interplay between the instruments. Messrs. Fine, Berkowitz, and Zighera gave a performance marked by clarity, control, and musicianship. Mr. Munch kept the string background so that the keyboard instruments could be clearly heard at all times.

After intermission Mr. Munch, orchestra, chorus, and soloists returned to perform the major work of the Bach series, the "Magnificat" in D major. The grandeur of Mr. Munch's conception at times was overpowering. The orchestra and chorus interpreted one of the great sacred works on a high esthetic plane which seemed to rise to the final exalted crescendo.

Edith Evans, mezzo-soprano, joined the four soloists in the cantata to sing "Et exultavit. . . ." With Phyllis Curtin's expressive interpretation of "Quia respexit . . ." Louis Speyer once more played a lyrically beautiful obbligato on the oboe d'amore. The duet by Miss Alberts, alto, and Mr. Lloyd, tenor, "Et misericordia . . ." was a marvel of artistic expression. Arias by the bass and tenor were on a high level, and throughout the extended work the points of excellence were too numerous to mention.

When Bach's "Magnificat" is interpreted and performed by musicians of excellence, the dramatic imagery and the ideas in the text become a living experience. Several tutti passages could be favorably compared to Bach's great Mass in B Minor. Sunday's performance approached the realization of a famous remark about the great canticle, that it is "an ecstasy of humility."

Attendance Records Fall Second Day

Lenox, July 8—A tremendous success was scored by Charles Munch in his opening series as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here at Tanglewood in the Bach series of the Berkshire festival. No conductor ever was given more of a welcome than was extended the noted French music director. His spontaneous readiness to share the applause with soloists, orchestra and Hugh Ross won for him the heart of every music lover who had come from far and wide to this great music center.

Records Broken

Two attendance records were broken in this, the first of three week ends of concerts in the theater-concert hall. Last night the crowd numbered 3600, or 900 more than was present at any previous first program in the festival history. With a warm breeze sweeping across the lawn there were 2400 reclining on the grass.

With the temperature hovering in the middle 90's this afternoon, still another record-breaking first Sunday crowd attended. A year ago 2700 were here at Tanglewood to witness the performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of the late Serge Koussevitzky, whereas today 2800 enjoyed the famous orchestra under the guidance of Mr. Munch and the chorus and soloists trained by Hugh Ross.

A comparison of box office figures show that the first two Bach programs of 1950 drew 5400 while this year's attendance bettered that mark by 1000. The Hayden series scheduled for next Saturday and Sunday as well as the Mozart programs of the following week end are already a sell out with only general admission tickets for the grounds available.

It is reported that reservations for the main concerts in the shed which open the 26th are already well ahead of last season.

Observing Opera Production

Hans Curjel, journalist and teacher of Zurich, Switzerland, is spending five days at Tanglewood to observe opera production at the Berkshire Music Center. He will write articles for the "Nationalzeitung" of Basle, the "Winterthurer Tagblatt" and the "Schweizerische Musikzeitung," and will broadcast over Radio Beromunster. Before the war he taught at the Mozarteum in Salzburg, where he staged opera for the famous festival.

Edward A. Taft, Dr. Lewis Perry, C. D. Jackson, president of the Boston Symphony Orchestra trustees, and their president, Henry B. Cabot, with Mrs. Cabot and Mrs. George R. Mumford Jr. of Boston, attended the opening of the Festival Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon.

Audiences of 500 and 600 attended the first chamber music concert and the first composers' forum yesterday morning and evening at the Berkshire Music Center. Overflowing the chamber music hall, which seats 300, they listened on benches and lawn through the open west side of the hall designed for the purpose by the late Eliel Saarinen, Finnish architect.

Robert Shaw, formerly of the choral department faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, is visiting at Tanglewood for a few days. On vacation after a nation-wide tour with the Robert Shaw Chorale, he will return to New York to plan for a similar tour during the coming season.

DAILY HAMPSH

Charles Munch Gives Excellent Performance

Leads Boston Symphony in Opening Sunday Concert. Phyllis Curtin Excels in Her Role. Audience Takes Munch to Their Hearts. Entire Afternoon Program of High Calibre

Music lovers went to the Berkshire Music Festival yesterday to hear good music. They were not disappointed.

Charles Munch conducted. It takes a great man to replace Serge Koussevitzky in the hearts of people. Munch's performance yesterday afternoon placed him as a conductor of truly great proportion.

Bach's music was the subject. Johann Sebastian Bach was a genius. Yesterday's interpretation showed that Munch too is a genius.

He had a deep and reverent feeling for the music, and the orchestra he was leading followed his magical baton and placed into being the kind of interpretation Munch wanted for this opening Sunday audience.

Many, who could not be classed as "long haired patrons and matrons of the art" attended this concert. It is good to see ordinary people attending these concerts, for there is much enjoyment from hearing the masters by great musical groups with an equally great leader.

Munch already occupies a niche high in the field of music. After this series at Tanglewood is ended, he should be firmly placed in the record book as a successor to one of the all time greats, Koussevitzky.

Phyllis Curtin sang the soprano solo. Her poise and range yesterday was superb. She was more than ordinary and although the audience didn't show enthusiasm too much out of the ordinary for her participation, comment from those attending showed that they "liked her very much."

Dr. Hugh Ross conducted the cantata. He is a good choral director and upheld the tradition of the Berkshire Music Festival in having outstanding musicians perform and direct for the public.

About 6500 attended the opening week-end performance. Yesterday's concert opened with the cantata "Der Zufriedengestelite Aeolus," or "Aeolus Pacified."

It was joyous and set the stage for the right mood on a beautiful afternoon in the splendoors of the Berkshire hills. It was in this cantata that Phyllis Curtin did such outstanding work. Other soloists were the Festival Trio, Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass. All did their job in a workmanlike manner. The Festival chorus sang magnificently and showed their professional status as a choral group.

The other choral work was "Magnificat," in D Major. The same soloists were heard with the addition of Edith Egans, who has a charming voice.

Between the two choral works, the "Concerto for Three Claviers with strings No. 1 in D Minor," was given. The pianists, all well known, were Messrs. Fine, Berkowitz and Zighera.

The Boston Symphony in its opening series was good as they always are. It is to be hoped future programs will be as good as this one was.—(W. F. C.).

Ovation Accorded Munch at Second Bach Concert

LENOX, Mass., July 8.—The ovation given Charles Munch this afternoon at Tanglewood at the end of the second Bach concert was far different from the reception he received when he made his first entrance last night on the stage of the theater-concert hall for his Tanglewood debut. Although he has completed two full seasons with the orchestra in Symphony Hall in Boston, he had not yet appeared at Tanglewood. This afternoon there was generous applause and many recalls; last night he was greeted with formal courtesy.

As the program proceeded it was possible to notice the increase of cordiality and accumulation of enthusiasm. He had reason, therefore, to be deeply pleased with the response of the huge audiences which attended both concerts. Last night there was an audience of 3,600, the largest Tanglewood opening concert in the theater-concert hall, and this afternoon the audience slightly exceeded the record of last year's first Sunday.

Mr. Munch paid tribute to the memory of his late predecessor, Serge Koussevitzky, with the final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion." The chorus was chosen from the student body of the Berkshire Music Center, the school Mr. Koussevitzky founded to complement the Tanglewood Festival. Mr. Munch made a few gracious and impressive remarks and asked that there be no applause following the chorus out of reverence for "the great leader, the great master."

This afternoon Hugh Ross conducted the secular cantata "Aeolus Pacified," and Mr. Munch the "Magnificat." Mr. Munch led the ensemble of thirty men in all the other numbers, including the accompaniments to the concerti for three pianos, one of which, in D minor, was played this afternoon and the other, in C major, last night. The soloists were Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. The D minor was much more effective. The soloists were not so restricted as they were on the opening night and the orchestra played with better balance.

Yesterday four of the Brandenburg concerti were played with varying effect. Munch's Bach is steady and sturdy, tending to be vehement where power is required and excessively restrained where quiet was desired. The nature of the auditorium demands certain adjustments with which Mr. Munch may not yet be familiar, but the spirit he injected into the two programs was reflected in the response of the audiences, and he may be said to have passed his initial ordeal triumphantly.

The next two week ends will be devoted to Haydn and Mozart respectively, and then the remainder of the Boston Orchestra moves in to join their colleagues for three weeks of concerts.

Mr. Fine, who teaches composition and harmonic analysis at the Berkshire Music Center, is composer in residence and lecturer in music at the new Brandeis University, Waltham. His compositions, which include "Incidental Music to Alice in Wonderland" and "Toccata for Orchestra," have been played at Symphony Hall by the Boston orchestra. He was in Paris on a Fulbright professorship, and in the coming year, on leave from Brandeis, will hold a Guggenheim grant to write music.

Dean of the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Berkowitz is accompanist to Gregor Piatigorsky.

Mr. Zighera, pianist and harpist with the Boston orchestra, returned recently from Europe, where he was a judge in the finals of the piano competition conducted by the Paris Conservatory of Music. As a student there he took prizes in harp and piano.

The Tanglewood grounds will open tonight at 6 and tomorrow for the chamber music concert at 10.30. They will reopen at 12 before the Bach concert and again in the evening for the composers' forum. General admission tickets for the Festival concerts will be available at the box office.

At the composers' forum at 8.15, open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, works of students of Aaron Copland, Luigi Dallapiccola and Irving Fine will be heard.

The program will be:

New Quartet To Open, Close Crompond Series

The New Music String Quartet, which will be heard at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., this Summer, wil play the opening and closing concerts in this year's series sponsored by the Crompond Music Association.

The dates for the series have been announced. All are on Friday evening,—July 6 and 20, and August 3, 17 and 31 at the Mohegan Colony School. The Amati String Quartet wil play the three mid-season concerts.

Five days after the New Music group opens the series here, it will play the identical program at Tanglewood. Scheduled to be heard are works of Hindemith, Verdi and Beethoven.

The Quartet, as its name implies, specializes in presenting new and the less familiar compositions.

The Quartet has made many New York appearances, —among the more recent those at the McMillan Theatre at Columbia University, and one with the New Friends of Music, New York.

Next season the Quartet plans its own New York series.

The Crompond Music Association is a non-profit organization. The annual series is offered as a cultural project, with the subscriptions merely covering the musicians' fees.

The seating capacity of the Mohegan School about 200, necessarily limits the number of subscriptions and individual tickets available.

Emil Bloch is the chairman of this years music series. He is being assisted by Mrs. Bern Dibner, Mrs. Isatzkin, Mis Doris Stetson, Miss Ruth Migdal, Max Friedman, Samuel Dillon, and Jacob Lippman.

2000 Hear First Concert By Students

Three Young Conductors Appear At Tanglewood

An audience of 2000 students and Friends of the Berkshire Music Center heard the first concert of the season at Tanglewood last evening. The three young conductors of the first half of the program are pupils of Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar deCarvalho, Seymour Lipkin, Howard Shanet and Richard Burgin, who took the baton for Brahm's Third Symphony.

Bernard Federowski, 20, who conducted the second and third movements from Beethoven's Fourth Piano Concerto, is a Brazilian. He came from Rio de Janeiro to study at the Juilliard School of Music, New York City. A violinist, he spent the summers of 1949 and 1950 at Tanglewood.

Russell Stanger, who conducted Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," is from Westboro. With a degree of bachelor of music from the New England Conservatory, Boston, while working toward his master's degree he conducts the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra. A graduate of Newton High School, he was at Tanglewood in 1948 and 1949. He plays violin, viola and piano.

The conductor of the allegro movement from Mahler's Second Symphony, Lorin V. Maazel of Pittsburgh is at the Berkshire Music Center for the first time. A student for three years of the University of Pittsburgh, he is studying violin and conducting.

Ralph Einstein, who was soloist in the concerto, studied piano with Bruce Simonds, Arthur Einstein and Felix Fox and musical theory with Paul Hindemith. In Providence he is a teacher and accompanist and plays in concert and recitals.

6000 Attend Opening Week End of Festival

Charles Munch Replaces Late Serge Koussevitzky as Conductor and Wins Praise of Audience

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, July 8—Tanglewood has opened its Berkshire Music Festival and business is booming with more than 6000 people attending the first week end concerts devoted to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach. The music of Bach used to be considered suitable only for the intelligensia, but times have changed, and Bach now draws the audiences he should. Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is conducting practically all the Festival concerts this year, due to the death of Serge Koussevitzky. His interpretations of the music of Bach are so spacious, so just as to rhythms, and so human, that this music is shown in all its vitality, humor and massiveness.

Praises Munch

I think the great public, as exemplified by those thousands who will attend this Berkshire Festival are going to like Mr. Munch. He has a charming smile, an unassuming manner, and gives the impression, to this listener, at least, that he enjoys every work he conducts. He does not appear to be a showman; everything goes off naturally, and he interprets the music pretty much as the composer wrote it.

The program today was refreshing to hear. It opened with a joyous performance of the cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus," or "Aeolus pacified." The soloists included the perennial Festival Trio, Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, and each did the usual workmanlike job, with Mr. Pease in particularly good voice and spirits as "Aeolus, God of the Winds." The soprano was Phyllis Curtin, whose voice is beautiful and whose artistry, vocal and interpretive, is far above the average.

Ross Conducts Cantata

Dr. Hugh Ross conducted the cantata and again revealed himself as one of the great choral directors of this generation. The Festival chorus sang magnificently, just as though it had had months, instead of days, to prepare the work. Even though most of them are trained singers, it takes sheer genius to achieve the unity and technical assurance one heard this afternoon.

The other choral work was the mighty "Magnificat" in D Major. The same soloists were heard, with the addition of Edith Egans, a very interesting mezzo-soprano. Again, Miss Curtain charmed the ear with the lovely aria for soprano and oboe d'amore, "Quia respexit humilitatem ancillae suae." Her top voice is crystal clear and she can summon an impressive climax. Miss Evans was also heard to advantage in her solo. Mr. Lloyd, sounding less vocally weary than when we least heard him, sang with his accustomed musicianship. Particularly effective was the Trio for the three women. It was the chorus which won the laurels. They sang with magnificent spirit and technical virtuosity. Mr. Munch sensed the grandeur of the work and never let it fall from its pedestal.

Rewarding Program

Between the two choral works was placed the "Concerto for Three Claviers with strings, No. 1 in D Minor." Last night we heard the "Concerto in C major." The pianists were Messers Fine, Berkowitz and Zighera." The performance this afternoon was better integrated and tonally more rewarding that the one last night. This was a performance of rare beauty and expressiveness, with the Boston Symphony players at their most persuasiveness.

Student Concerts At Tanglewood

Students at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, which opened on Sunday will give the first concerts of their six-week school season tomorrow evening.

The school's symphonic orchestra, made up entirely of members of the orchestral music classes, will present one of the concerts under the direction of Richard Burgin, associate conductor and concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with students in the school of conducting leading several of the numbers. At the same time, students in the chamber music section will give a program under the direction of Gregor Piatigorsky and William Kroll, who head that section. The concerts by the student groups, which will continue through the school season, are open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Membership in the society is granted to those who send donations to the school.

HAYDN CONCERTS AT TANGLEWOOD

Programs Saturday Night, Sunday Afternoon

Lenox, July 10—A week end of music by the symphonic master, Haydn, is scheduled for Tanglewood this Saturday and Sunday. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will present this second of three series of concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall, Saturday at 8.15 and Sunday at 3.

Saturday evening's concert will present Seymour Lipkin as soloist in Haydn's D major Piano Concerto, and the Symphonie Concertante, for violin, cello, oboe, and bassoon. Also on the program will be the G major Symphony (No. 88) and the London Symphony (No. 104).

Sunday afternoon's concert consists of Haydn's Violoncello Concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky as soloistt; and the "Clock" (No. 101), "Drum Roll" (No. 103), and "Oxford" (No. 92) Symphonies.

attend this Berkshire Festival are going to like Mr. Munch. He has a charming smile, an unassuming manner, and gives the impression, to this listener, at least, that he enjoys every work he conducts. He does not appear to be a showman; everything goes off naturally, and he interprets the music pretty much as the composer wrote it.

The program today was refreshing to hear. It opened with a joyous performance of the cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus," or "Aeolus pacified." The soloists included the perennial Festival Trio, Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, and each did the usual workmanlike job, with Mr. Pease in particularly good voice and spirits as "Aeolus, God of the Winds." The soprano was Phyllis Curtin, whose voice is beautiful and whose artistry, vocal and interpretive, is far above the average.

Record Crowd at Festival Enthusiastic Over Munch

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—Charles Munch received a generous and eager ovation at the end of yesterday afternoon's Bach concert in the Theatre Concert Hall as a record-breaking crowd turned out for the opening of the Berkshire Music Festival.

6400 at First Concerts

Saturday night a crowd of 3600 attended the concert, 900 more than the opening night attendance a year ago and yesterday afternoon 2800 filled the concert hall to overflowing, bringing the week-end total to 6400, which represents 1000 more than the attendance for the first week end of 1950.

Mr. Munch has completed two full seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston but he had never appeared at Tanglewood before Saturday night when he led an ensemble of some 30 men in the opening concert of this season's Bach-Haydn-Mozart series.

Yesterday he closed the concert with his most effective work of the week end when he conducted the Festival chorus in the "Magnificat" with a distinguished list of soloists of which Phyllis Curtin was soprano, Edith Evans, mezzo, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. Before intermission he had conducted the concerto for three pianos and strings in which the soloists had been Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. Hugh Ross led the chorus and orchestra with a quartet of soloists in the secular cantata, "Aeolus Pacified" to open the program.

Tribute to Koussevitzky

Saturday night Munch made a touching short address before playing the final chorus of the "St. Matthew Passion" in honor of the memory of the late Serge Koussevitzky who died on June 4. He requested the tremendous audience to refrain from applause and to stand for a moment of silent tribute to "the great leader, the great master."

A record audience for opening night greeted the conductor new to Tanglewood and although the initial reception was kindly there was an implied challenge that he would have to prove himself. The applause at the end of the first evening and again at the conclusion of yesterday's concert proved without question that Munch had established himself in the Berkshires purely on his merits. His is an individual manner. There is a complete absence of falderal. His facial expression as he bows to his audience has a friendly warmth but he does not delay with such matters. He is on and off the stage with strict alacrity.

The passing of his illustrious predecessor made new plans necessary swiftly. Munch stepped in to assume not only the duties he had agreed to share in the early preparations of the season but also those which Koussevitzky was to have undertaken. His musicianship was not on trial. That has long been conceded but there was natural curiosity concerning the man who was to bear the responsibilities up to now laid on the able shoulders of the internationally renowned artist whose name was practically synonymous with Tanglewood.

It is debatable whether a man would voluntarily choose an "ordeal by Bach" for such a situation. In any case Munch's Bach afforded the audiences variety and color over a strong and solid base. Saturday night there were four of the Brandenburg concerti. They did not reach equal altitudes. It is possible that Munch was not familiar with the peculiar acoustic problems of the open-sided and open-backed hall in which these concerts, originally intended to be on the intimate side, were played. For if he were, we assume he might have allowed more tone to have been produced in passages where he restrained the orchestra and, in the three-piano concerto, the soloists.

First-Chair Men Fine

The first-chair men of the Boston orchestra played the solos which fall to their lot in the Brandenburgs with their expected distinction. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, played with musicianly articulation in his several assignments and the flutes of Georges Laurent and James Madsen, the oboe of Ralph Gomberg, were highly commendable. The trumpet in F in the F major concerto, No. 2, was blown directly into the printed copy on the desk, thus robbing it at least of some of its brilliance.

Munch omitted the two-chord bridge between the movements of the G major concerto with which he opened the series, nor did he inject a selected slow movement from another Bach source as has been the custom on previous performances of this concerto. The tonal balance in the sixth Brandenburg, for violas and celli only, came a degree below full satisfaction, particularly in the second theme in the violas where the droning celli overshadowed the poetic lyricism of the theme.

The coming week ends will be devoted to Haydn and Mozart respectively, and then, the entire remainder of the orchestra will come up from Boston for the three weeks of concerts in the great Music Shed by the entire Boston Symphony.

Amusements

Back in this country after appearing in England on the Bob Hope radio shows, Les Brown, long a favorite with Central Pennsylvania dancers, will lead his popular orchestra at the Hershey Park Ballroom tonight. Sharing the spotlight with Less will be pretty Lucy Ann Polk, vocalist; "Butch" Stone, comedy vocalist, and Les's younger brother, "Stumpy," trombonist.

The Sensational Williams, who performs on a 140-foot sway pole, is presenting his aerial act twice daily through Sunday. Performances, which are being given at the park athletic field, are at 4:30 and 9:30 p. m.

Sunday concerts in the park bandshell will be presented by Post 27 American Legion Band, of Harrisburg. Concerts will be given from 2 until 4 and 7 until 9 o'clock.

The programs are announced by Charles Munch for all the concerts of the Berkshire Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood July 5 to August 12.) Mr. Munch, the orchestra's music director, will bring to an end his European engagements to return and make his first appearance at Tanglewood. The programs do not greatly differ from those formerly announced when Serge Koussevitzky was expected to conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall and the Shed concerts of the closing week. Charles Munch will conduct two numbers in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. The final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the opening Bach concert and Mozart's funeral music at the opening concert in the Shed, and has asked Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Eleazar De Carvalho will conduct on Aug. 5; otherwise the concerts will all be under the leadership of Mr. Munch.

TANGLEWOOD OPENS WITH MUSIC BY BACH

Charles Munch and Hugh Ross Direct as Record Audiences Attend First 2 Concerts

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 8—Record audiences attended the two opening concerts of the 1951 Berkshire Music Festival, held last night and this afternoon in the Theatre Concert Hall. They gave long standing ovations to Charles Munch, the new music director and conductor; Hugh Ross, the choral director; the soloists, the Festival Chorus and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their all-Bach programs.

Last night, Mr. Munch led the Boston Symphony of thirty-five in the first of the summer's six concerts—the Bradenburg Concertos No. 2, 3, 4 and 6 and the Concerto for three pianos in C major, with Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera as the trio-pianists. The same three artists performed the Concerto in D minor for three pianos and strings this afternoon.

At Saturday night's opening program, 3,600 were present, the largest audience to attend the first night of the "Little Series." Last year's attendance was 2,700.

As with the festival concert series in the main shed, the majority of the listeners were comfortably dispersed over the lawn, taking advantage of the first warm summer night the Berkshires have enjoyed.

After the intermission Saturday night, Mr. Munch announced that in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew" would be sung by the Festival Chorus. He asked the entire audience to stand for a moment of silence at its conclusion.

Mr. Ross opened this afternoon's all-Bach program with "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" ("Aeolus Pacified"), Bach's boisterous and vivacious secular cantata. It was magnificently sung by the Festival Chorus and the four soloists, Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Mr. Munch then took over the baton to conduct the remainder of the program, the Concerto in D minor for three pianos and strings and the "Magnificat."

This afternoon's attendance was 2,800, bringing the total figure for both programs to 6,400, as compared to last year's 5,400.

PROGRAM OF BACH GIVEN AT OPENING FESTIVAL CONCERT

Audience at Berkshire Music Center Pays Silent Tribute To Koussevitzky

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox July 7—The all-Bach program given by members of the Boston Symphony tonight under Charles Munch, at the opening concert of the Berkshire Music Festival, paid tribute not only to the master himself but also to Serge Koussevitzky.

Moment of Silence

The final chorus from the St. Matthew passion which serves as a glorious benedictfon to this sublime work was an appropriate and tremendously moving emotional expression in memory of a great conductor. It was sung with a flood of tonal beauty and dignity, and reverence of spirit that made it the towering moment of the concert.

Mr. Munch asked the audience not to applaud at the finish but instead arise in a moment of silence. It was a moving tribute.

Charles Munch gave the third Brandenburg concerto a forthright statement that was strong, bold, and broad, but steady of beat and line. Technically too, it was a fine performance with the exception of a phrase or two in the last part of the first movement where the violas got ahead of the conductor.

Irving Fine, Ralph Berkovitz, and Bernard Zighera, pianists, were soloists in the Bach concerto in C Major for three pianos, giving it a nice, tappy bounce of tone and rhythm as well as delicacy of nuance. It was a perfectly integrated performance, always in scale, and often suggested the harpsichord.

Roger Voisin, with his high Bach-trumpet was the hero of the first and last movements of the second Brandenburg concerto, with Richard Burgin, Georges Laurent, and Ralph Gomberg lending a sweet harmonious ensemble to the slow movement with their violin flute and oboe, respectively. Mr. Munch gave the bigger movements a virile rhythmic drive that was gripping and seemed in the true Bach spirit.

He conducted at all times with the greatest economy of gesture and never allowed himself to come between the listener and the music. The audience gave him a tremendous ovation. The concert closed with the sixth and fourth Brandenburg concertos.

Memorial to Founder

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Shall there not be a permanent memorial here to the man who made Tanglewood a glory of America? Today, Tanglewood means the best music in the world. The vision and inspiring energy of Serge Koussevitzky created the Festival and then with rare foresight, he built also for the future and founded the Berkshire Music Center. People come from all the States and from many lands to these concerts and students hear old masters and new composers in daily association with outstanding musicians. Dr. Koussevitzky was a perfectionist. He had learned that only by work and discipline could they weave their dreams into the texture of life. The school was particularly dear to his heart.

Surely, the legions who have been uplifted by the beauty of Tanglewood will want to contribute to an endowment to make the Berkshire Music Center permanent. Dr. Koussevitzky spent himself and made this community famous. Every one who heard the mighty symphonies amid the pines under the stars owes him a heartfelt debt for giving a spiritual meaning to our daily lives. Who will come forward in gratitude with big and little contributions for the Berkshire Music Center?

6,000 Pay Tribute To Koussevitzky

Lenox, Mass., July 27. (AP) — Instead of the customary applause some 6,000 persons stood reverently silent Thursday night when Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, ended his first piece at opening of the Berkshire Music Festival.

The piece was Mozart's masonic funeral music, played in honor of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the 77th anniversary of Koussevitzky's birth and the first time he missed the opening of the concerts at Tanglewood's shed since it became a center of music 13 seasons ago.

Munch asked the audience not to applaud and suggested that a moment of silence be observed, instead.

Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed conductor who died last month, was in the box section of the big music shed during the first half of the program.

Ninth Season At Tanglewood Opens Sunday

Tanglewood, Lenox, June 28—The first eventful week of the 1951 Tanglewood season opens Sunday as the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center opens, and as Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra arrive to prepare for their initial concerts, Saturday and Sunday, July 7 and 8, of music by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Serge Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity church in Boston, and trustee of the orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work this Monday in each of the five departments. The first of more than 30 musical events to be performed by the students will take place on Friday evening, July 6, with a concert by the Student Symphony orchestra, performing in the Music Shed.

As the music school gets under way, the Boston Symphony orchestra arrives at its summer home, too. Charles Munch arrives in Boston Sunday from France, having cancelled his European engagements in order to conduct at the Berkshire Festival concerts. His rehearsals for the first series of week-end concerts of music by Bach, Haydn and Mozart will begin this week. Tickets for these concerts, and for concerts in the Music Shed, are still available at the ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox.

Foundation's Gift to Center; Play First Concert Wednesday

Lenox, July 9—The New Music String Quartet, which Wednesday at Tanglewood will play the first of three weekly chamber concerts, is composed of Claus Erle and Matthew Raimondi, violinists; Walter Trampler, violist, and Claus Adam, cellist. The series is a gift to the Berkshire Music Center from the Elizabeth Sprague Colidge Foundation of the Library of Congress.

Music of All Periods

The quartet, whose schedule this summer includes appearances at the Locust Valley, L. I. and the Cumberland (Sewanee, Tenn.) festivals, the McDowell Colony, Peterboro, N. H. and for the Willeke Memorial, South Mountain, Pittsfield, was organized two years ago to play music of all periods, which they believe "becomes new when experienced anew."

One of its aims is "to restore to the repertoire of chamber music the works of lesser-known composers who enjoyed a just fame in the past but who are now forgotten." It has played for music courses of Bennington, Ohio University, and Yale, and the Baltimore, Cleveland and Gardner Museums. Sponsors have included New Friends of Music and the International Society for Contemporary Music at the Library of Congress.

Erle was a member of the Bloch String Quartet and a former concert master of the NBC Orchestra in Philadelphia and of the Ballet Theatre Orchestra. Raimondi studied with Adolfo Betti, Ivan Galamian, Felix Salmond and Hans Letz. He is a graduate of the Julliard School of Music in New York.

Studied in Munich

Trampler, a graduate of the State Academy of Music in Munich, played with the Strub String Quartet in Europe and was later violist and soloist with the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra. Since coming to the United States he has been a member of the faculty of Rollins College, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and first violist with the New York City Symphony Orchestra and Opero Company.

Adam, cellist and composer, after winning the Gabrilovitch prize became first cellist with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra while teaching at the University of Minnesota. He is a director of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

The Quartets to be played are the Hindemith in F Minor, Verdi in E Minor and Beethoven in C Major. Members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and guests of Mrs. Coolidge are invited to Wednesday's concert and to programs by the Berkshire Trio July 18 and the Moyse Trio July 25.

Announce Program For Concert at Mohegan School

The program to be played by the New Music String Quartet at the opening concert of the Crompond Music Association series Friday night has been announced.

The concert, the first of five, all on Friday night at the Mohegan School, will consist of Verdi's String Juartet; the First String Quartet, Opus 10, in F minor, by Hindemith; and Beethoven's C Major String Quartet, Opus 59, No 3, better known as the last of the three Razumovsky string quartets.

Starting time Friday is 8:45.

The first Crompond concert by the New Music group will be repeated five days later when the quartet gives a concert at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass. The [illegible] will play the final concert of the Summer series here on Aug. 31.

Other concerts in the series, are on July 20, and August 3 and 17. These will feature the Amati String Quartet.

Emil Bloch is chairman of this year's series, annual subscription and ticket events. Sponsoring organization is nonprofit; the series is a community cultural project.

Ninth Season At Tanglewood Opens Sunday

Tanglewood, Lenox, June 28—The first eventful week of the 1951 Tanglewood season opens Sunday as the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center opens, and as Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra arrive to prepare for their initial concerts, Saturday and Sunday, July 7 and 8, of music by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Serge Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity church in Boston, and trustee of the orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work this Monday in each of the five departments. The first of more than 30 musical events to be performed by the students will take place on Friday evening, July 6, with a concert by the Student Symphony orchestra, performing in the Music Shed.

As the music school gets under way, the Boston Symphony orchestra arrives at its summer home, too. Charles Munch arrives in Boston Sunday from France, having cancelled his European engagements in order to conduct at the Berkshire Festival concerts. His rehearsals for the first series of week-end concerts of music by Bach, Haydn and Mozart will begin this week. Tickets for these concerts, and for concerts in the Music Shed, are still available at the ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox.

STRING QUARTET TO OPEN SERIES AT TANGLEWOOD

Foundation's Gift to Center; Play First Concert Wednesday

Lenox, July 9—The New Music String Quartet, which Wednesday at Tanglewood will play the first of three weekly chamber concerts, is composed of Claus Erle and Matthew Raimondi, violinists; Walter Trampler, violist, and Claus Adam, cellist. The series is a gift to the Berkshire Music Center from the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress.

Music of All Periods

The quartet, whose schedule this summer includes appearances at the Locust Valley, L. I. and the Cumberland (Sewanee, Tenn.) festivals, the McDowell Colony, Peterboro, N. H. and for the Willeke Memorial, South Mountain, Pittsfield, was organized two years ago to play music of all periods, which they believe "become new when experienced anew."

One of its aims is "to restore to the repertoire of chamber music that heart The Eli[illegible] works of lesser-known composers who and that it the highest enjoyed a just fame in the past but our visitors th who are now forgotten." It has played I am going for music courses of Bennington, Ohio the world, and University, and Yale, and the Baltimore, Cleveland and Gardner Museums. Sponsors have included New North Adams. Friends of Music and the International Society for Contemporary Music at the Library of Congress.

Studied in Munich

Trampler, a graduate of the State Academy of Music in Munich, played with the Strub String Quartet in Europe and was later violist and soloist with the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra. Since coming to the United States he has been a member of the faculty of Rollins College, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and first violist with the New York City Symphony Orchestra and Opero Company.

Adam, cellist and composer, after winning the Gabrilovitch prize became first cellist with the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra while teaching at the University of Minnesota. He is a director of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

The Quartets to be played are the Hindemith in F Minor, Verdi in E Minor and Beethoven in C Major. Members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and guests of Mrs. Coolidge are invited to Wednesday's concert and to programs by the Berkshire Trio July 18 and the Moyse Trio July 25.

Boston Symphony Head Arrives

The 60-year-old maestro leaves tomorrow for Tanglewood in Lenox to conduct the Berkshire festival concerts made famous by Koussevitzky.

At Tanglewood Munch will dedicate three concerts in memory of Koussevitzky along with the original program as set up by the late conductor. The first memorium will be next Saturday, the second on July 26, and the third, August 9.

Munch brought back a new composition by Lukas Foss, official pianist for the Boston Symphony. Foss is in Italy on a fellowship at the American Academy in Rome. The composition will be played for the first time at the next symphony season in the fall.

Berkshire Art Centers Open Summer Programs

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The summer cultural arts center of the United States was formerly opened in the Berkshires over the weekend with the University of the Dance at Jacob's Pillow inaugurating the first of a series of dance programs under the direction of Ted Shawn.

direction of Ted Shawn.

Between the afternoon and evening performances on Friday, the directors gave a cocktail party and buffet to friends and patrons of the school. Noted among those who attended were Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, distinguished patron of music; Walter Terry, dance critic of the Herald Tribune; Murray C. Smouse, member of the board of directors of Jacob's Pillow, and Mrs. Smouse; Mr. and Mrs. Oscar Hallenbeck, and Gertrude Hallenbeck; Mrs. Esther Griswold and Ned Wheeler of Albany; La Meri and Peter Di Falco, stars of next Friday and Saturday's performances.

THE OPENING WEEK'S program was a brilliant one, enlisting the artistic dancing of Nora Kaye, Hugh Laing, Diana Adams, in the classical field; Richard and Flora Stewart in a series of modern dances and Hadassah and company in a repertory of Israeli and Eastern dances.

Tanglewood, the Berkshire Music center in the Berkshires, officially opened Sunday afternoon, with the rain preventing the scheduled tea in the gardens. The exercises were held in the theatre-music hall and were devoted to a memorial to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, founder of the school and late director of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

SPEAKERS included Dr. Lewis Perry, trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Dr. Theodore Ferris, rector of Trinity church, Boston, also a trustee; Aaron Copland, composer and chairman of the faculty and Leonard Bernstein, former protege of Dr. Koussevitzky. The festival chorus of the center, directed by Hugh Ross sang Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," written especially for the opening of the music shed in 1940.

Koussevitzky Project

To THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR:

Serge Koussevitzky, a conductor of unique talents, is no longer present to further the cause of American music. In addition to his many outstanding qualities he was also the greatest champion of American composers—a group to which the writer belongs by profession.

The question has been raised as to the future of the famous Berkshire Music Center, now that it lacks the personal enthusiasm of its dynamic founder, Serge Koussevitzky. It is heartening to learn that it will continue this year, at least, under the able administration of Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland.

However, maintenance of the Center is known to be very costly to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In view of this state of affairs, might it not be fitting to have the composers who benefited so much by Koussevitzky's efforts come, in some way, to the aid of this most valuable, indispensable institution? In view of its past achievements, its role in the future of American music could be of incalculable importance.

Now is the time for all those who believe in the necessity for such a school to do something about it. This is a great opportunity for American music—a moment not only for the continuation and development of a great idea, but for expansion. We must not let it pass by. We must build on the foundations laid by this great, generous, foreign-born American. FREDERIC VONN

Season Opens Next Week End At Tanglewood

Lenox, June 30—Charles Munch is to arrive by plane tomorrow at Boston from a series of concerts in France and Italy and will drive to Lenox to open the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with two Bach concerts next Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. The French conductor, who has completed his second season as the music director of this orchestra, is taking the concerts which the late Serge Koussevitzky had intended to lead. The programs, slightly different from those originally announced, will be as follows:

Saturday, July 7—Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Concerto for three pianos in C major (soloists, Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, Ralph Berkowitz); Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Brandenburg Concerto No. 6; Brandenburg Concerto No. 4.

Sunday, Juy 8—Bach: Cantata "Der Zufriedengesteilte Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto for three pianos in D minor (soloists, Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, Ralph Berkowitz); Magnificat in D.

The opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center will take place at Tanglewood tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 and will be followed by a reception in the garden.

Munch Plans Memorial Concerts

Boston, July 2 —(UP)— Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived home from a European vacation cut short by the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and announced plans for two memorial concerts for his predecessor.

The concerts will be played during the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Munch said as he arrived here by plane yesterday. They will include the last chorus of the St. Matthew Passion and the funeral music of Mozart.

Leonard Bernstein, one of Koussevitzky's most brilliant proteges, will conduct the orchestra in a third memorial Aug. 9 when Beethoven's Missa Solemnis will be played.

Munch also announced on his return that he had brought back a new piano concerto by Lukas Foss, a former Bostonian, and that it would be performed for the first time during the orchestra's regular season. Foss, one-time pianist with the Boston Orchestra, now is studying in Rome.

Berkshire Festival Expected To Follow Koussevitzky Plans

NEW YORK, June 29 — Despite the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Berkshire Music Festival which he fostered at Tanglewood in Massachusetts is expected to go forward much as originally planned.

Charles Munch, who succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky when the latter retired as music director of the Boston Symphony, has cut short his European engagements and is returning the first week in July to open the festival on July 7.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned and Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. Aaron Copland will join him at the school.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is being urged to visit Europe this summer for concerts to be conducted by Eugene Ormandy, its leader. Bordeaux, Paris and Helsinki are mentioned for appearances if the tour materializes. Harl McDonald, manager of the orchestra, has pointed out, however, that a European tour can be undertaken only if the entire costs are guaranteed by booking agents abroad.

An ambitious season has been planned by the New Orleans Opera Association for next fall. It will open on Oct. 11 with "Traviata," featuring Della Rigal, Robert Merrill and Brian Sullivan.

Other performances will be: Oct. 25, 26, 27—"Fledermaus" — Regina Resnik, Lois Hunt, Brian Sullivan, Thomas Hayward, John Brownlee, Clifford Hasvourt. Nov. 29 and Dec. 1 — "Tosca" — Dorothy Kirsten, David Poleri. March 20, 22—"Mignon" — Blanche Thebom, Marilyn Cotlow, Leopold Simoneau. April 3, 5 — "Rigoletto"—Leonard Warren, Patrice Munsel, Eugene Conley. April 17, 19 — "Manon" — Bidu Sayao, Anton Dermota, Martial Singher. May 1, 3 — "Marriage of Figaro" — Frances Yeend, Adelaide Bishop, Frances Bible, James Pease, Walter Cassel.

America will contribute 500,000 marks to support the Festival of the Arts held in Berlin from July 6 to 30. It will include performances by the leading orchestras, opera and theatrical companies of Europe and is expected to be the chief musical event of the year.

Continue Chamber Music Concerts At Tanglewood

For the sixth consecutive year, three chamber music concerts will be presented at Tanglewood, Lenox, during the Berkshire music festival season under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress.

The foundation was established by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, creator of the South Mountain Music temple in Pittsfield and patroness of the long series of summer chamber music concerts held there.

The first of the three concerts at Tanglewood will be given Wednesday evening, July 11, by the New Music string quartet. The other two will follow on successive Wednesday evenings, that on July 18 to be presented by the Berkshire trio, and that on July 25 by the Moyse trio.

The New Music quartet, whose members are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violin; Claus Adam, violoncello, and Walter Trampler, a former Tanglewood student, will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C major by Beethoven.

The Berkshire trio, composed of Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, both members of the Boston orchestra and the Music center faculty, and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, will include early French music. They will play the Sonata in G (Antonio Lotti); Sonata in F (Benedetto Marcello); Sonata in C (Haendel); Sonata a trois (J. M. [illegible] Sonate (Martinu).

The concerts will be open to students, Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public, as have other chamber music programs given through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Foundation each summer since 1946.

Tanglewood To Open Its Gates Tomorrow; Music Center Starts

The gates of Tanglewood will open for the 1951 season tomorrow.

Ceremonies at 3 o'clock in the big music shed will inaugurate the ninth season of the Berkshire Music center, the school for advanced students which Serge Koussevitzky established at the Lenox estate after the Berkshire Symphonic festival already had made it America's best known music resort.

The festival season itself will open six days later—a week from this evening — when the initial concert in the preliminary series of six devoted to the works of Bach, Mozart and Haydn will be presented.

Approximately 400 students are enrolled for six weeks of the Music center school. They will study composition, opera, choral conducting and singing, orchestral conducting and allied subjects, and there is a course, for teachers of music, all under the supervision of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra and other noted musicians.

Leonard Bernstein, outstanding protege of the center's founder, will take over the direction of the center for which Dr. Koussevitzky was actively planning when he was stricken and died a few weeks ago. Aaron Copland, noted American composer, will be back as assistant director.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston orchestra, is expected to reach Boston tomorrow —although not in time to reach Tanglewood for the opening of the Music center—to begin preparations for the festival concerts. He has cut short a European tour to direct the Bach-Mozart-Haydn series which Dr. Koussevitzky was to have conducted, and the concerts in the subsequent major series in the music shed which Koussevitzky had reserved for his own direction.

The music center opening series tomorrow afternoon will be open to the 400 students in the school, to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music center, and to invited guests.

Munch Plans Memorial Concerts

Boston, July 2 —(UP)— Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived home from a European vacation cut short by the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and announced plans for two memorial concerts for his predecessor.

The concerts will be played during the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Munch said as he arrived here by plane yesterday. They will include the last chorus of the St. Matthew Passion and the funeral music of Mozart.

Leonard Bernstein, one of Koussevitzky's most brilliant proteges, will conduct the orchestra in a third memorial Aug. 9 when Beethoven's Missa Solemnis will be played.

Munch also announced on his return that he had brought back a new piano concerto by Lukas Foss, a former Bostonian, and that it would be performed for the first time during the orchestra's regular season. Foss, one-time pianist with the Boston Orchestra, now is studying in Rome.

Berkshire Festival Expected To Follow Koussevitzky Plans

NEW YORK, June 29 — Despite the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Berkshire Music Festival which he fostered at Tanglewood in Massachusetts is expected to go forward much as originally planned.

Charles Munch, who succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky when the latter retired as music director of the Boston Symphony, has cut short his European engagements and is returning the first week in July to open the festival on July 7.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned and Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. Aaron Copland will join him at the school.

The Philadelphia Orchestra is being urged to visit Europe this summer for concerts to be conducted by Eugene Ormandy, its leader. Bordeaux, Paris and Helsinki are mentioned for appearances if the tour materializes. Harl McDonald, manager of the orchestra, has pointed out, however, that a European tour can be undertaken only if the entire costs are guaranteed by booking agents abroad.

An ambitious season has been planned by the New Orleans Opera Association for next fall. It will open on Oct. 11 with "Traviata," featuring Della Rigal, Robert Merrill and Brian Sullivan.

Other performances will be: Oct. 25, 26, 27—"Fledermaus" — Regina Resnik Lois Hunt, Brian Sullivan, Thomas Hayward, John Brownlee, Clifford Hasvourt. Nov. 29 and Dec. 1 — "Tosca" — Dorothy Kirsten, David Poleri. March 20, 22—"Mignon" — Blanche Thebom, Marilyn Cotlow, Leopold Simoneau. April 3, 5 — "Rigoletto"—Leonard Warren, Patrice Munsel, Eugene Conley. April 17, 19 — "Manon" — Bidu Sayao, Anton Dermota, Martial Singher. May 1, 3 — "Marriage of Figaro" — Frances Yeend, Adelaide Bishop, Frances Bible, James Pease, Walter Cassel.

America will contribute 500,000 marks to support the Festival of the Arts, held in Berlin from July 6 to 30. It will include performances by the leading orchestras, opera and theatrical companies of Europe and is expected to be the chief musical event of the year.

Continue Chamber Music Concerts At Tanglewood

For the sixth consecutive year, three chamber music concerts will be presented at Tanglewood, Lenox, during the Berkshire music festival season under the auspices of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress.

The foundation was established by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, creator of the South Mountain Music temple in Pittsfield and patroness of the long series of summer chamber music concerts held there.

The first of the three concerts at Tanglewood will be given Wednesday evening, July 11, by the New Music string quartet. The other two will follow on successive Wednesday evenings, that on July 18 to be presented by the Berkshire trio, and that on July 25 by the Moyse trio.

The New Music quartet, whose members are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violin; Claus Adam, violoncello, and Walter Trampler, a former Tanglewood student, will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C major by Beethoven.

The Berkshire trio, composed of Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, both members of the Boston orchestra and the Music center faculty, and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, will include early French music. They will play the Sonata in G (Antonio Lotti); Sonata in F (Benedetto Marcello); Sonata in C (Haendel); Sonata a trois (J. M. Leclair); Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise (Couperin) and Troisieme Concert (M. P. Rameau).

The Moyse trio, whose players are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis, piano and flute, and his daughter-in-law, Blanche Monegger-Moyse, violin and viola, have selected Trio-sonate en sol majeur (Bach); Duo pour 2 flutes (Haendel); Trio en ut (Haydn-Moyse); Musique en trio (Andre Thiriet); Trois Interludes (Ibert); Trois Petites Pieces en trio (Arthur Honegger); La Chanson pour 2 flutes et violon (Marcel Gennaro); Serenade pour 2 flutes et viola (Louis Moyse) and Trio-Sonate (Martinu).

The concerts will be open to students, Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public. As have other chamber music programs given through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Foundation each summer since 1946.

Berkshire Festival Begins Today; Bach Programmed

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, Mass., June 30.—The first eventful week of the 1951 Tanglewood season begins Sunday as the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center opens and as Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony orchestra arrive to prepare for their initial concerts Saturday and Sunday of music by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Serge Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity church in Boston, and trustee of the orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work Monday in each of the five departments. The first of more than 30 musical events performed by the students will take place on Friday evening with a concert by the student symphony orchestra, performing in the Music Shed. The popular Sunday morning student chamber music recitals, and the weekly Composers' Forums will also begin next week. These concerts, and the others, will be attended by Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, and by other students. Last year the total attendance at such student events exceeded 50,000.

As the music school gets under way, the Boston Symphony orchestra arrives at its summer home too. Charles Munch arrives in Boston Sunday, from France, having cancelled his European engagements in order to conduct at the Berkshire Festival concerts. His rehearsals for the first series of weekend concerts of music by Bach, Haydn, and Mozart will begin this week. Tickets for these concerts, and for concerts in the Music Shed, are still available at the ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

The gates of Tanglewood will open for the 1951 season tomorrow.

Ceremonies at 3 o'clock in the big music shed will inaugurate the ninth season of the Berkshire Music center, the school for advanced students which Serge Koussevitzky established at the Lenox estate after the Berkshire Symphonic festival already had made it America's best known music resort.

The festival season itself will open six days later—a week from this evening — when the initial concert in the preliminary series of six devoted to the works of Bach, Mozart and Haydn will be presented.

Approximately 400 students are enrolled for six weeks of the Music center school. They will study composition, opera, choral conducting and singing, orchestral conducting and allied subjects, and there is a course, for teachers of music, all under the supervision of members of the Boston Symphony orchestra and other noted musicians.

Leonard Bernstein, outstanding protege of the center's founder, will take over the direction of the center for which Dr. Koussevitzky was actively planning when he was stricken and died a few weeks ago. Aaron Copland, noted American composer, will be back as assistant director.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston orchestra, is expected to reach Boston tomorrow —although not in time to reach Tanglewood for the opening of the Music center—to begin preparations for the festival concerts. He has cut short a European tour to direct the Bach-Mozart-Haydn series which Dr. Koussevitzky was to have conducted, and the concerts in the subsequent major series in the music shed which Koussevitzky had reserved for his own direction.

The music center opening series tomorrow afternoon will be open to the 400 students in the school, to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music center, and to invited guests.

Music

Fills The Air . . .

THERE'S a "Little Red House" in the Berkshires. This restored landmark has attracted many visitors, who wish to see where one of America's famous authors stayed over a century ago, and conceived his "Wonder Book" and "Tanglewood Tales."

But Nathaniel Hawthorne never imagined the wonderful story of Tanglewood today. On this 200-acre estate sloping down to the shores of Lake Makeenac is the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Since 1936 music has filled the air for ever-increasing numbers of summer visitors and vacationers in the Berkshires.

Located between Lenox and Stockbridge, Massachusetts, against a background of picturesque mountains, sparkling lakes, and lovely townsites that have never lost any of the charm of their Colonial simplicity, is a sports, vacation and musical paradise.

The Tanglewood Season for 1951 runs from July 2nd to August 12th. The first three weekends, of two concerts each, feature the works of Bach, Haydn and Mozart. The following weekends will be devoted to the music of a great number of old masters plus some modern composers, presented on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons.

The Bach, Haydn and Mozart series will take place in the Theatre-Concert Hall; the others in the Music Shed. This last is a unique, semi-open, pie-shaped building, seating over 6,000 with accommodations for many more on the lawns. It was designed by Saarinen, the Finnish architect. The acoustics, whose remarkable quality is enhanced by the sound reflector at the rear of the curvilinear structure, were devised by Professor Richard D. Fay, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The Berkshire Music Center is another major feature of Tanglewood activity. This is a school conducted by the Boston Symphony for talented students. Here the future bright lights of the concert and operatic world are coached by some of the world's foremost musicians. Instrumental, choral and symphonic recitals are given almost daily throughout the season. They are open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Just a voluntary contribution to the support of the Center constitutes membership in this Society. This school is an attraction whose rich reward should not be overlooked by any music lover. But America's greatest summer musical event will sorely miss Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who directed the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Music Center for so many years. His death late this Spring brought sorrow to everyone interested in music. His place on the podium will be taken by Charles Munch, the present director of the Orchestra, who had been scheduled previously for two of the series. Conductors Eleazar de Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein will assume some of the other assignments.

When you know you can enjoy music at its best and add that to the natural assets of the Berkshires, you don't have to wonder at the superb resorts, excellent hotels and hospitable old inns that date way back, that are available. The Berkshires are your answer to the quest for a perfect summer holiday or weekend trip.

Berkshire Luxury Place Era Fades With Years

BARRINGTON HOUSE—Fabulous mansion will house insurance company employes on their vacations.

By JOHN B. KNOX

GREAT BARRINGTON, Mass. — (AP)— A fantastic and fabulous era which sprinkled Massachusetts' famous Berkshire Hills with dream-like palaces is fading into history.

Sale of Barrington House, a great blue-stone mansion of French chateau style, to a New York Insurance Company is a symbol of a chapter's end.

This is the story of Barrington House, of Shadowbrook, of Ashintully, of Tanglewood, of Brookside, of Erskine Park, of many other estates and huge homes — still standing monuments to vanished men and another way of life. The families who lived in them bore names to conjure with—Carnegie, Vanderbilt, Field and Biddle, Hopkins, Tytus, Adams and Stokes, Stuyvesant, Harriman, Crocker, Aspinwall and Sloane.

Barrington House was built 65 years ago. Into it and its surrounding meadows, the widow of railroad builder Mark Hopkins and her new husband poured part of Hopkins' Union Pacific millions. Older residents of this town can still remember the building of the enormous red-slate-turrented castle.

It was part and parcel of a golden age which filled the beauty spots of Newport, R. I., and Lenox, Stockbridge, and other Berkshire towns, with romantic villas, unbelievable gardens, and stately mansions. Mark Hopkins' widow lived but four years after her grand house was built. Then it passed to her amateur-architect, decorator husband, Edward E. Searles.

Eventually, Barrington House—after a period of dust-gathering disuse—became a private school for girls. And now the basement will become a storage for the microfilm records of the H. Insurance Company of New York. The remainder of the property from which common folk were long barred will become a recreation center for the firm's employes.

A special quarry on a mile-distant mountainside provided stone for the big house and its thousands of yards of dressed stone walls. A specially-built railroad hauled the stone. En route, the trains crossed the Houstonic River on a bridge specially built for the railroad.

While millions of Americans in cities and towns still were strangers to the electric light, a private steam-electricity generating plant lighted the buildings on the estate.

But a private power plant was not unique, even then. Northward, in villa-dotted Lenox, George Westinghouse built his spreading "Erskine Park" (one day also to become a school for girls). Not pleased with the glare of 1,500 electric bulbs, Mrs. Westinghouse suggested a special molding where ceilings joined walls. Thus originated domestic indirect lighting.

Taglewood—at the Stockbridge and Leox town border— where Nathaniel Hawthorne wrote his Tanglewood Tales—now is the home of the famous Berkshire Music Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thousand-acre Shadowbrook, where Anson Phelps Stokes built a hundred-room grey-stone house with scarlet roof, later was the home of Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt, and afterwards of Andrew Carnegie. A four-horse coach could have clattered up its main staircase. Now Shadowbrook is a Jesuit novitiate.

Stories handed down from Shadowbrook's hey-day shed light on that era of vast house parties. A son Yale with some friends of the class of 1896 wired: "Coming home bringing some '96 men." Maybe the operator mis-cued. Perhaps his mother read too hastily. But she telegraphed this reply: "House full—room for only 40."

Outmatching even Shadowbrook was "Ashintully"—the estate of Robb de Peyster Tytus, Egyptologist. Some said the family had incurred the displeasure of Egypt's dead kings by disturbing their sleep.

Lenox was home to the Biddles, the Adamses, the Crockers, the Aspinwalls, the Stuyvesants, the Harrimans, and many other family of famous name. Neighboring Stockbridge, like Lenox, was filled with names and homes of the once-great as were other towns up and down the country.

Gardens sprang up that rivaled the centuries old gardens of Europe. Owners and agents combed Italy, France, the world, for ironwork, statuary, fountains. Imported foreign experts cunningly exploited every vista of mountain and lake and added man-made charm to the already-lovely landscape.

Beyond wall and hedge armies of gardeners spread an ever-changing prospect of flowers. There were swans, peacocks, and conservatories with tropical and semi-tropical flowers and fruits.

Gone today are the troops of immigrant servants who once made it possible for others to be gay in the many-roomed mansions. Hard-to-get (and pay for) are butlers, gardeners, and other workers needed to keep up the grand air. So houses and gates have been closed. Dust gathers in rooms once bright with finery and laughter. Prospective dairy farmers and hotel operators have shopped among the "for sale" signs.

Some properties have been cut up for the more streamlined, and simpler estate of today. In these, unexpected luxury hides behind outward simplicity.

For Berkshire still is Berkshire and illustrious names sparkle in Berkshire directories. These are hailed as worthy successors to Bryant, to Longfellow, to Melville, to Hawthorne, to Edith Wharton, to the Sedgwicks and others—even to George Francis Root.

You don't know Root? Oh yes, you do. He wrote sentimental war songs that shook folks' hearts long years ago: "The Battle Cry of Freedom"; "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys Are Marching"; "Just Before the Battle, Mother"; "The Vacant Chair."

Berkshire This Year

Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work at the school. Aaron Copland will join him at the school.

Berkshire Music Center to Open Season Tonight at Tanglewood

Rev. Theodore Ferris Will Speak, Leonard Bernstein To Laud Dr. Koussevitzky

Special to The Sunday Republican

Berkshire Hills, June 30—The Berkshires, which in recent years have become known as one of the musical cultural centers in America, will open for the coming season tomorrow when the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center will have exercises in the theater-concert hall, beginning at 3.30 at Tanglewood, Lenox. Rev. Theodore Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give an address, and Leonard Bernstein, the conductor, will speak in tribute to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which furnished the music programs at Tanglewood. Dr. Koussevitzky, who died recently, was the founder and director of the music school. Aaron Copeland, assistant director of the Music Center, will introduce the faculty.

The exercises will have traditional closing established at the opening of the first session, the singing by the students the "Alleluia Chorus" by Randall Thompson. Tea will follow in the Tanglewood garden. Dr. Lewis Perry a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and chairman of the Society of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Another feature at Lenox this season is the sculpture exhibit given by the Students' Workshop, which opened today on the lawn of the Lenox library and will continue until July 10. The exhibit is open daily from 1 to 7. Twenty-five have pieces on exhibition. Several of them have been made by students of Miss Franc Epping of Lenox, well-known sculpturess. Among those exhibiting from the county are Mr. and Mrs. Stuart Sande of Ashley Falls, Mrs. Hartwell Homer of Great Barrington, Mrs. Nathan Horwitt and son, William, of Stockbridge.

A familiar figure in the community life of Lenox is to retire from his duties as postmaster of Lenox. He is Charles H. McCarty, postmaster since 1936, who started as clerk in the office in 1913. Mr. McCarty who retires today, has had a wide acquaintance among summer visitors in Lenox. Since he first became associated with the Lenox office he has seen the business enjoy a big increase due to the Tanglewood concerts.

A move which has created considerable interest in Southern Berkshire was a meeting recently at Mason public library, Great Barrington, where a group interested in organizing a historical society met and discussed preliminary plans. Practically every village in Southern Berkshire had a representative at the meeting. Miss Elsie M. Huntley, and Mrs. Barbara Kop, botn of Great Barrington, were named temporary president and clerk respectively of the group. A meeting will be held in July whereby the group will name permanent officers and plans will be determined for the future activities of the society.

The third annual antique show sponsored by the Old Parish Church in Sheffield will be held this year for three days, Aug. 17, 18 and 19. The event has attracted considerable attention among antique lovers, and has had on display pieces from well-known antique dealers from Connecticut, New York and Massachusetts.

Two old friends of silent movie days met this week at the Stockbridge Playhouse when John L. E. Pell of Sheffield, noted historian and writer, paid an informal visit to Miss Lillian Gish, star at the Playhouse this week in "Miss Mabel." Mr. Pell and Miss Gish discussed their days together under the late David W. Griffith, the movie producer. Mr. Pell was scenario writer for Mr. Griffith, when Miss Gish often played the lead in some of his productions.

Landlord James J. Joyce of the Berkshire Inn, Great Barrington, formerly opened the social season at the Inn Tuesday afternoon with a tea for his guests and friends. About 200 were on hand for the affair. Mrs. John H. C. Church and Mrs. William R. Blair of Great Barrington poured. They were assisted by Mrs. James J. Joyce, Mrs. Aubrey T. Barnes, Mrs. Edwin C. Greenwood, Mrs. Thomas S. Ramsdell, Mrs. Joseph H. Maloney, Mrs. A. Leroy Johnson, Mrs. Robert K. Wheeler, Mrs. Edward C. Durant, Miss Frances Sands Drury, Miss Fay Campbell and Mrs. F. D. Griswold.

Mr. and Mrs. John B. Hull, Jr., of Oak St., Great Barrington, entertained at a cocktail party this afternoon in their home, the occasion being their 25th wedding anniversary. The couple were married in Norwood June 30, 1926. She is the former Miss Eleanor Williamson. Mr. Hull is the son of Mr. and Mrs. John B. Hull of West Ave., Great Barrington. The elder Hull had served as representative for his district and has been a leading political figure in State Republican ranks.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Spencer and daughter, Judith, of Elm St., East Longmeadow, have been spending a few days on the Cape.

Dr. and Mrs. George B. Corcoran of Ohio Ave., West Springfield, have opened their summer cottage at Lake Congamond for the season. Dr. Corcoran will resume his practice Aug. 1. They have with them their grandchildren Susan and Joseph Foley of Boston, children of Dr. and Mrs. Joseph Foley. Their daughter, Miss Cecily Ann Corcoran, has been accepted at the Marine Training School, Quantico, Va., where she is taking a 12-week course.

In Brief . . .

Yesterday's formal opening of the Berkshire Music Center was probably the finest tribute Serge Koussevitzky has received, for it went far beyond a mere memorial service. It showed that the indomitable, creative spirit he brought to the founding of the Center lives on in those who are responsible for keeping it in the forefront of the musical world . . . On the death of such a man as Louis E. Underwood, one is left with the feeling that there is something to be said for retirement; that at least the items and testimonials and editorials prompted by his leaving the GE let him know before he died how highly he was regarded by his fellow workers and his community . . . Thirteen-year-old Michael Ellery, only Pittsfield entry to win in yesterday's state finals of the 40 & 8's model sailboat contest, shares the glory with Dr. William J. O'Hearn. The Pittsfield dentist gave most of his spare time through a winter to make the 36-inch model . . .

Tonight's Electrics game with Oneonta is about as close as you could get to a press agent's dream. Two teams half a game apart and the first half title hinging on this one meeting should bring out the fans if anything ever will . . . The marker at the site of the North Adams Iron works, whence came the plates for the ironclad Monitor, is a pleasant contribution to the county's still-inadequate recognition of its rich historical background. Munch Will Lead Berkshire Music Festival This Year

NEW YORK, June 30. (UP)—Despite the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Berkshire Music Festival which he fostered at Tanglewood in Massachusetts is expected to go forward much as originally planned.

Charles Munch, who succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky when the latter retired as music director of the Boston Symphony, has cut short his European engagements and is returning the first week in July to open the festival on July 7.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert on August 5 as planned and Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis on August 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. Aaron Copland will join him at the school.

Berkshire Music Center to Open Season Tonight at Tanglewood

Rev. Theodore Ferris Will Speak, Leonard Bernstein To Laud Dr. Koussevitzky

Special to The Sunday Republican

Berkshire Hills, June 30—The Berkshires, which in recent years have become known as one of the musical cultural centers in America, will open for the coming season tomorrow when the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center will have exercises in the theater-concert hall, beginning at 3.30 at Tanglewood, Lenox. Rev. Theodore Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give an address, and Leonard Bernstein, the conductor, will speak in tribute to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which furnished the music programs at Tanglewood. Dr. Koussevitzky, who died recently, was the founder and director of the music school. Aaron Copeland, assistant director of the Music Center, will introduce the faculty.

The exercises will have traditional closing established at the opening of the first session, the singing by the students the "Alleluia Chorus" by Randall Thompson. Tea will follow in the Tanglewood garden. Dr. Lewis Perry a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and chairman of the Society of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Another feature at Lenox this season is the sculpture exhibit given by the Students' Workshop, which opened today on the lawn of the Lenox library and will continue until July 10. The exhibit is open daily from 1 to 7. Twenty-five have pieces on exhibition. Several of them have been made by students of Miss Franc Epping of Lenox, well-known sculpturess. Music Notes

By D. E. RITZ

Two area students and two Schenectady public school music teachers are at the New York State Music Camp at Otter Lake this summer. The students are Ann H. Wheeler of 208 First street, Scotia, who is majoring in oboe, and Richard Schuyler of 21 Steers avenue, who is majoring in violin. Both attended the camp last summer.

Faculty members include Willard I. Musser of 126 Vley road, Scotia, and Anthony Pezzano of this city. Musser, who is director of instrumental music at Mont Pleasant high school, directs the camp symphony orchestra, teaches a course in college preparatory music, instructs the brass instruments class and is a member of the camp's board of directors. Pezzano, director of instrumental music at Nott Terrace high school, teaches harmony and directs the string program.

The Schenectady Light Opera auditions, held June 16 at the Schenectady Museum, will be of value to all who participated. Not only did the 11 contestants have the opportunity to sing before competent judges but they are being offered the individual constructive criticisms which the judges made. Contestants wishing to receive the criticism should apply to the chairman of the judges, Edward J. Hatfield Jr. Other judges were Dr. Elmer Tidmarsh, Mrs. F. A. Hamilton and George Pickering.

Winners of the auditions were Miss Edith Struglia, first place; and Edward Currie, second place.

Miss Struglia is a fourth grade teacher at Horace Mann school. She has directed the school choir, been a member of the Schenectady Choral Society for three years and sings in St. Luke's Church choir. Her voice study was done at Cortland State Teachers' College and Ithaca College.

Mr. Currie, who studies voice with John Lloyd, has had leading roles in the "Wizard of the Nile," "The Mikado" and "The Chocolate Soldier." He is soloist at the Christian Science Church here.

The Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., will open this Saturday evening with an all-Bach program presented by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch. The program will start at 8:15 o'clock and be presented in the Theatre-Concert Hall. The final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" will be presented in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Other numbers on the program will be the "Brandenburg Concerto number 3," "Concerto for Three Pianos in C major" with Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz as soloists; and the "Brandenburg Concertos numbers 2, 6 and 4."

A Sunday afternoon program, also all-Bach, will open at 3 o'clock. Included in the program will be the Cantata, "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" with Hugh Ross conducting; the "Concerto for Three Pianos in D minor" with the Saturday evening soloists featured and the "Magnificat in D."

Tickets for the concerts are still available at the ticket office at Tanglewood.

Three concerts of chamber music will be presented at the Berkshire Music Center through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The series will open on the evening of July 11 with a program by the New Music Quartet. It will be followed on July 18 with a program by the Berkshire Trio and on July 25 with a program by the Trio Moyse.

Members of the New Quartet are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violins; Claus Adam, violoncello; and Walter Trampler, viola. They will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C major by Beethoven.

The Berkshire Trio includes Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord. The trio program will be devoted to early French music including a "Sonata in G" by Antonio Lotti "Sonata in F" by Benedetto Marcello; "Sonata in C," Haendel; "Sonata a troi" by J. M. Leclair; "Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise" by Couperin and "Troisieme Concert," M. P Rameau.

Members of the Moyse Trio are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis piano and flute; and his daughter in-law, Blanche Honegger-Moyse violin and viola. They have selected "Trio-Sonate en sol majeur" by Bach; "Duo pour Two Flutes," Haendel; "Trio en ut," Haydn-Moyse; "Musique en trio," Andre Thiriet; "Trois Interludes," Ibert; "Trois Petites Pices en trio," Arthur Honegger; "La Chanson pour deux flutes et violon," Marcel Gennaro; "Serenade pour deux flutes et Viola," Louis Moyse; and "Trio-Sonate," Martinu.

The concerts will be open to students, Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public.

The 17-member Zimbler Sinfonietta, made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a special concert at South Mountain in Pittsfield Aug. 6 at 4 p.m. on behalf of the United Cerebral Associations of Massachusetts. The group is co-operating with Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and the South Mountain Association for the concert and all participating artists will donate their talent. The unusual feature of the 17-member group is that it plays without a conductor. It is under the artistic direction of Josef Zimbler, who is arranging a special program for the occasion.

Koussevitzky Honored At Berkshire Opening

By EMMA VAN WORMER

TANGLEWOOD—The Berkshire Music Center opened here yesterday with a dedication to the ideals and dreams of the founder, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whose magic in the universe of music was responsible for the fashioning of "Tanglewood" as it has been for a quarter of a century in keeping the Boston Symphony Orchestra among first orchestras of the world.

There was a moment of silence by the nearly 400 music center students, and the many friends of the Berkshire Music Center, as the program opened in the theater-concert hall.

Dr. Lewis Perry, president of the center, greeting Mme. Koussevitzky, faculty members, students and friends, emphasized the perfection demanded by Dr. Koussevitsky and the latter's belief that religion and music were one.

THE REV. DR. THEODORE PARKER FERRIS, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony, spoke of the reasons to give thanks for Dr. Koussevitsky's inestimable gifts to music, of his high purposes, his sense of the dramatic and his capacities for giving a music-hungry people music of many ages and many lands.

Aaron Copland, widely known American composer and recently named chairman of the Berkshire Music Center, spoke briefly, and introduced members of the center faculty and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leonard Bernstein, the young conductor whose studies and friendship with the late Dr. Koussevitzy, extended over a decade, spoke with deep feeling of that combination he possessed of personal example and dynamic contact—which is the manner of all great teaching. He (Bernstein) will take over the orchestral and conducting department in the center, assisted by Richard Burgin, Boston Symphony concert master; Eleazar De Carvalho (who conducted the Israel Philharmonic in Syracuse last winter, and Seymour Lipkin, pianist, a new member of the faculty.

HUGH ROSS, head of the center choral conducting and chorus, conducted Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," the student body singing the soaring music with fine effect. Among several noted musicians introduced was Liugi Dallapiccola, recently arrived from Italy, to be instructor in composition during the six weeks term.

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony, who arrived in Boston yesterday by plane from Europe will motor to Tanglewood today, accompanied by George E. Judd, business manager of the orchestra. Director Munch will conduct the six concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra members in the theater-concert hall, bach-Hayden-Mozart programs, beginning next Saturday night and continuing through Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons through July 22. He also will conduct several programs in the three concert series in the Shed beginning July 26 through Aug. 12.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Beethoven Missa.

A GREAT VIRTUOSO

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY leaves several monuments to his genius. He brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a position of eminence unsurpassed in this country. He introduced the works of modern composers to large audiences, and encouraged young Americans with a gift for writing music to expect a public hearing from him. He founded a music festival at Tanglewood, Mass., which has become world famous.

Finally, he founded the Berkshire Music Center where he led a remarkable faculty in working with advanced students, who got an opportunity to perform under sympathetically critical eyes. And he was a man of personal integrity, who cancelled an engagement to conduct a festival at La Scala in Milan in protest over the imprisonment of Toscanini for refusing to play the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert in the days of Mussolini.

Dr. Koussevitzky has been for more than a quarter of a century an institution in this country, so much so that it is something of a shock to realize that nearly two-thirds of his life had passed abroad before coming here. He was 49 when he became conductor of the Boston Symphony. At 65, he started another successful career with the founding of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, followed by the Music Center. Recordings today save a conductor from obscurity but Koussevitzky's influence will live even more as a teacher through the numerous men and women who called him maestro and imbibed some of his musicianship.

Koussevitzky's Great Personality Will Long Be Alive

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

THE late Serge Koussevitzky left behind him two living memorials—the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony was not the creation of his hand and mind; but the ideals of orchestral tone, and technical capacity formed by the several great artists who had preceded him as its conductor became fixed in the image of his art and personality. It rose to an uncontested first place among this country's symphony orchestras. Tanglewood, the second living memorial to Koussevitzky was his brain-child. He brought the multitudes to this beautiful Berkshire home of the muse. His prestige gathered the funds necessary to make it permanent, adequate, and an adornment of nature's beautiful setting. He made the Berkshire Music Center something more important and enduring than just another distinguished festival of summer concerts played at the highest artistic level.

Thus, the Berkshire Music Center became a great school for conductors and composers active in symphony, opera and chamber music. He assembled a faculty of internationally renowned composers, performers and teachers. He gathered the student body with equal care. The cream of the talent of this hemisphere came to Tanglewood.

ALL this was accomplished almost within a decade. Taking over from the ailing Henry Hadley and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in the early '30s, Koussevitzky needed the lesson of only one heavy rain to replace the temporary shelter of a tent with the present beautiful and efficient buildings.

Discouraged Washington music lovers struggling to maintain an orchestra and lacking suitable auditoriums for music, winter or summer, will want to know how he accomplished all this. By his own prestige and the influence deriving therefrom.

After Hans Kindler's death, it is well to remember, he offered to do as much and more for the Nation's Capital. Directors of the National Symphony declined his help. "Koussevitzky is clear out of our class," said one of the group. He was right, of course. A community which accepts a voteless place in a democracy, deserves what it gets and, even more, what it doesn't get.

Now that Koussevitzky has died the permanency of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center is proved by the continuity of all activities planned by the dead founder and conductor. Charles Munch, who succeeded Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cut short his European engagements for the summer and returns to take over the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 7.

HE WILL conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall and, in addition to the two weeks of scheduled concerts already announced, will also conduct the final week of concerts. Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned and Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis already scheduled for Thursday evening, Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikowsky's "Pique Dame" and the school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos."

There is no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments.

Aaron Copland who has been this winter in the American Academy at Rome, will return in time for the school's opening exercises next Sunday.

CHARLES MUNCH, who has been conducting concerts in Paris and elsewhere, will close his European season in Strasbourg tomorrow and will return to America to arrive in Lenox for the opening Bach concerts.

Munch has sent word that there will be a minimum of change in the programs originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. Full program details will be announced shortly.

The Berkshire Trio includes Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord. The trio program will be devoted to early French music including a "Sonata in G" by Antonio Lotti "Sonata in F" by Benedetto Marcello; "Sonata in C," Haendel; "Son ata a trol" by J. M. Leclair; "Les Pastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise" by Couperin and "Troisieme Concert," M. P Rameau.

Members of the Moyse Trio are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis piano and flute; and his daughter in-law, Blanche Honegger-Moyse violin and viola. They have selected "Trio-Sonate en sol majeur" by Bach; "Duo pour Two Flutes," Haendel; "Trio en ut," Haydn-Moyse; "Musique en trio," Andre Thiriet; "Trois Interludes," Ibert; "Trois Petites Pices en trio," Arthur Honegger; "La Chanson pour deux flutes et violon," Marcel Gennaro; "Serenade pour deux flutes et Viola," Louis Moyse; and "Trio-Sonate," Martinu.

The concerts will be open to students, Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public.

The 17-member Zimbler Sinfonietta, made up of members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present a special concert at South Mountain in Pittsfield Aug. 6 at 4 p.m. on behalf of the United Cerebral Associations of Massachusetts. The group is co-operating with Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and the South Mountain Association for the concert and all participating artists will donate their talent. The unusual feature of the 17-member group is that it plays without a conductor. It is under the artistic direction of Josef Zimbler, who is arranging a special program for the occasion.

A Great Virtuoso

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky leaves several monuments to his genius. He brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a position of eminence unsurpassed in this country. He introduced the works of modern composers to large audiences, and encouraged young Americans with a gift for writing music to expect a public hearing from him. He founded a music festival at Tanglewood, which has become world famous. Finally, he founded the Berkshire Music Center where he led a remarkable faculty in working with advanced students, who got an opportunity to perform under sympathetically critical eyes. And he was a man of personal integrity, who cancelled an engagement to conduct a festival at La Scala in Milan in protest over the imprisonment of Toscanini for refusing to play the Fascist hymn as a prelude to a concert in the days of Mussolini.

Dr. Koussevitzky has been for more than a quarter of a century an institution in this country, so much so that it is something of a shock to realize that nearly two-thirds of his life had passed abroad before coming here. He was 49 when he became conductor of the Boston Symphony. At 65, he started another successful career with the founding of the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, followed by the Music Center. Recordings today save a conducter from obscurity but Koussevitzsky's influence will live even more as a teacher through the numerous men and women who called him maestro and imbibed some of his musicianship.

Koussevitzky Honored At Berkshire Opening

By EMMA VAN WORMER

TANGLEWOOD—The Berkshire Music Center opened here yesterday with a dedication to the ideals and dreams of the founder, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, whose magic in the universe of music was responsible for the fashioning of "Tanglewood" as it has been for a quarter of a century in keeping the Boston Symphony Orchestra among first orchestras of the world.

There was a moment of silence by the nearly 400 music center students, and the many friends of the Berkshire Music Center, as the program opened in the theater-concert hall.

Dr. Lewis Perry, president of the center, greeting Mme. Koussevitzky, faculty members, students and friends, emphasized the perfection demanded by Dr. Koussevitsky and the latter's belief that religion and music were one.

THE REV. DR. THEODORE PARKER FERRIS, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, and a trustee of the Boston Symphony, spoke of the reasons to give thanks for Dr. Koussevitsky's inestimable gifts to music, of his high purposes, his sense of the dramatic and his capacities for giving a music-hungry people music of many ages and many lands.

Aaron Copland, widely known American composer and recently named chairman of the Berkshire Music Center, spoke briefly, and introduced members of the center faculty and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leonard Bernstein, the young conductor whose studies and friendship with the late Dr. Koussevitzy, extended over a decade, spoke with deep feeling of that combination he possessed of personal example and dynamic contact—which is the manner of all great teaching. He (Bernstein) will take over the orchestral and conducting department in the center, assisted by Richard Burgin, Boston Symphony concert master; Eleazar De Carvalho (who conducted the Israel Philharmonic in Syracuse last winter, and Seymour Lipkin, pianist, a new member of the faculty.

HUGH ROSS, head of the center choral conducting and chorus, conducted Randall Thompson's "Alleluia," the student body singing the soaring music with fine effect. Among several noted musicians introduced was Liugi Dallapiccola, recently arrived from Italy, to be instructor in composition during the six weeks term.

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony, who arrived in Boston yesterday by plane from Europe will motor to Tanglewood today, accompanied by George E. Judd, business manager of the orchestra. Director Munch will conduct the six concerts by Boston Symphony Orchestra members in the theater-concert hall, bach-Hayden-Mozart programs, beginning next Saturday night and continuing through Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons through July 22. He also will conduct several programs in the three concert series in the Shed beginning July 26 through Aug. 12.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Beethoven Missa.

Koussevitzky's Great Personality Will Long Be Alive

By GLENN DILLARD GUNN

THE late Serge Koussevitzky left behind him two living memorials—the Boston Symphony and Tanglewood.

The Boston Symphony was not the creation of his hand and mind; but the ideals of orchestral tone, and technical capacity formed by the several great artists who had preceded him as its conductor became fixed in the image of his art and personality. It rose to an uncontested first place among this country's symphony orchestras. Tanglewood, the second living memorial to Koussevitzky was his brain-child. He brought the multitudes to this beautiful Berkshire home of the muse. His prestige gathered the funds necessary to make it permanent, adequate, and an adornment of nature's beautiful setting. He made the Berkshire Music Center something more important and enduring than just another distinguished festival of summer concerts played at the highest artistic level.

Thus, the Berkshire Music Center became a great school for conductors and composers active in symphony, opera and chamber music. He assembled a faculty of internationally renowned composers, performers and teachers. He gathered the student body with equal care. The cream of the talent of this hemisphere came to Tanglewood.

ALL this was accomplished almost within a decade. Taking over from the ailing Henry Hadley and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony in the early '30s, Koussevitzky needed the lesson of only one heavy rain to replace the temporary shelter of a tent with the present beautiful and efficient buildings.

Discouraged Washington music lovers struggling to maintain an orchestra and lacking suitable auditoriums for music, winter or summer, will want to know how he accomplished all this. By his own prestige and the influence deriving therefrom.

After Hans Kindler's death, it is well to remember, he offered to do as much and more for the Nation's Capital. Directors of the National Symphony declined his help. "Koussevitzky is clear out of our class," said one of the group. He was right, of course. A community which accepts a voteless place in a democracy, deserves what it gets and, even more, what it doesn't get.

Now that Koussevitzky has died the permanency of Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music Center is proved by the continuity of all activities planned by the dead founder and conductor. Charles Munch, who succeeded Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cut short his European engagements for the summer and returns to take over the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, July 7.

HE WILL conduct the Bach-Haydn-Mozart concerts in the theater-concert hall and, in addition to the two weeks of scheduled concerts already announced, will also conduct the final week of concerts. Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned and Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis already scheduled for Thursday evening, Aug. 9, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The Berkshire Music Center, the school which Dr. Koussevitzky created at Tanglewood, is to continue in accordance with plans announced. Leonard Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his close associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. He had been granted a leave of absence from Tanglewood this summer.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, will stage and conduct Tchaikowsky's "Pique Dame" and the school will also produce Richard Strauss' "Ariadne Auf Naxos."

There is no change in the announced plans for the choral, chamber music and composition departments.

Aaron Copland who has been this winter in the American Academy at Rome, will return in time for the school's opening exercises next Sunday.

CHARLES MUNCH, who has been conducting concerts in Paris and elsewhere, will close his European season in Strasbourg tomorrow and will return to America to arrive in Lenox for the opening Bach concerts.

Munch has sent word that there will be a minimum of change in the programs originally planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. Full program details will be announced shortly.

Memorial Service in New York For Dr. Koussevitzky Tonight

LENOX—To commemorate the 40th day of his death, a memorial service will be held tonight in a Russian Orthodox church in New York for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The service will be held at the Russian Orthodox church at 59 East Second Street.

Attending the service at which Bishop John of Brooklyn, N.Y., will officiate will be the late conductor's widow, Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, and her sister, Duchess Anna de Leuchtenberg, who is now living at Seranak, the Koussevitzky home, for the summer. Duchess de Leuchtenberg arrived recently from Nice, France, with her three daughters, Anna, Olga and Natalie, who are now members of the Festival chorus at the Berkshire Music Center. They plan to live permanently in the United States.

Before leaving for New York this afternoon Mrs. Koussevitzky, her sister and family attended a brief memorial service for Dr. Koussevitzky at his grave in the Lenox Cemetery-on-the-Hill. Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church, officiated.

Mrs. Koussevitzky will return to her Lenox home late tomorrow afternoon. She plans to attend several concerts at Tanglewood in the next few weeks. She was present at the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center and last Saturday evening attended the concert in memory of her late husband in the theatre-concert hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch conducting, and the Festival chorus presented the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion. Following last Sunday afternoon's concert Mrs. Koussevitzky entertained at her home near Tanglewood, Mr. Munch and several trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

More than 300 musical associates, friends and guests crowded into the Church-on-the-Hill, Congregational, Sunday evening to hear a brief memorial musical tribute to the late Dr. Koussevitzky. Noted artists, associated with Koussevitzky at Tanglewood and in the music world, presented a program devoted to the late conductor's favorite selections. Artists participating included Ruth Posselt, Richard Burgin, George Moleux, Jean Bedetti, Joseph de Pasquale and Alfred Patterson.

Present in the audience which filled the ground floor of the historic church were students and teachers from Tanglewood, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and townspeople of Lenox. Faculty members at the Music Center attending the service who had worked with Koussevitzky were Leonard Bernstein and Gregor Piatigorsky.

Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the church, read the 103d Psalm, Koussevitzky's favorite, and gave the benediction.

Music Center Opens Sunday

The ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center will open Sunday afternoon at 3.30 with exercises in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood. Dr. Lewis Perry, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and chairman of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Rev. Theodore Ferris, rector of Trinity Church, Boston, an orchestra trustee, will give the address and Leonard Bernstein will speak in tribute to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, founder and director of the school and former music director of the Boston orchestra. Aaron Copland, assistant director of the Center, will introduce the faculty.

The exercises will close, according to tradition established at the opening of the first session in 1940 by the singing of the students of the "Alleluia Chorus," composed for the occasion by Randall Thompson. Tea will follow in the Tanglewood garden.

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

SO far as the general public is concerned, Koussevitzky's death will not change the character of this year's Berkshire Festival a great deal. Charles Munch, the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, was originally scheduled to conduct in the Shed for two weekends. He will now conduct the third except that the performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" has been entrusted to Leonard Bernstein and will be given in memory of Koussevitzky.

Quite different will be the story of the Bach, Haydn and Mozart weekends catering to the smaller audiences. Koussevitzky always suffused these with an intimacy all his own. That they will be different in character under Munch is altogether probable, but he has made no significant shifts in the programming.

The great change will undoubtedly be in the atmosphere of the Berkshire Music Center created by Koussevitzky as the major activity at Tanglewood.

WITH Aaron Copland back from the American Academy at Rome, Leonard Bernstein returning from Mexico especially to take over Koussevitsky's work, and Boris Goldovsky returning to head the opera department, the general picture of the functioning of the school will be similar to that of other years.

The show must go on as Koussevitsky would have had it.

The fact that one hundred more students have enrolled to date indicates the vitality of the Center.

The spirit of Koussevitzky will undoubtedly dominate everything that happens in Tanglewood this Summer. Besides the Beethoven Mass, his memory will be evoked by the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion at the first concert on Saturday and by the Mozart Funeral Music at the opening of the Shed concerts on July 26.

What other years may bring forth no one can know. Koussevitzky fashioned the Center for study "on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance."

In nine sessions the seed has been well planted. The fruit should be good.

"TRIAL BY JURY," Gilbert and Sullivan's hilarious tale of a breach of promise case, will make a return engagement to Twilight Time Friday night. In response to numerous requests, the tuneful comedy will be presented in concert style by the Twilight Time chorale and orchestra as the feature of the fourth show in the amphitheater at N Walker and NW 37.

The story of the operetta stems from the cruel overthrow of a girl by a lawyer who used her father to scale the heights of the English courts as a barrister. After suing the defendant for breaking his marriage proposal, the girl finds herself attracted to the judge, and the climax of the case comes when the judge finally decides to marry the plaintiff. It becomes quite involved, but as in all Gilbert and Sullivan music, right triumphs and the final chorus finds everyone completely happy and satisfied.

Jack Laws, tenor, will sing the role of the defendant. Jack Lash, bass, will take the important role of judge. Margaret Haslam, soprano, will sing the role of the jilted maid; Frank Bottome will handle the role of the attorney for the plaintiff and Don Webb will sing the usher.

Julia Louise Herrmann will make a return appearance on Twilight Time in the first half of the show. Her harp solos will have chorus and orchestra accompaniments. Miss Herrmann will feature a composition in the modern idiom, "Shangri La" as her main number. The young harpist will leave immediately after the show for concert appearances in New York and other points in the east. She has become widely known through her television and radio work in Oklahoma City.

The remainder of the first half of the show will feature the regular members of the cast in their specialties. Bobbie Jene Simmons (Miss Oklahoma) will again sing, as will Shirley Conrad and the Twilighters quartette.

A BROCHURE from the United States Steel Co., sponsors of the NBC Symphony Summer concerts, announces Victor Alessandro's guest appearance as conductor of the orchestra on Sunday, July 15, at 8:30 p. m. Dr. Alessandro is one of 13 top flight directors who will appear on this summer series in which the lighter music will be featured.

Other conductors who will appear include: Alfred Wallenstein, Sigmund Romberg, Arthur Fiedler, Percy Faith, Maurice Abravenal, Atnal Dorati, Milton Katims, Vladimir Bakaleinikoff, Fritz Reinder, Hans Schwieger, Arthur Bennett Lipkin and Harold Levey. The concerts will be heard locally over station WKY by transcription at a different time from the original programs. Consult your daily radio page for time schedule.

KAREN KEYS, 252 NW 36, has been enrolled as a pianist for the Berkshire Festival. Thirty-three states and 11 countries are represented in the list of students for the ninth session of this great music festival. The 364 students have been accepted for six weeks study of advanced music. The school is held in connection with the annual festival which Charles Munch will open July 7 with the first of three weekend programs of two concerts each of the music of Bach, Haydn, and Mozart.

Students will study conducting, composition, chamber music, opera, solfege, and analysis of classical and modern works under some of the greatest musicians of our time.

Berkshire Festival Tops Past Attendance Record

LENOX, Mass., June 30—Talented students thronging to attend the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, so far have broken last year's reservation record.

The center, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school, will have students from 33 states, including Arizona, and 11 countries.

The school opens Monday, with an advance list of 364 students on the roster.

ARIZONANS attending the school include Neil Shafer, 310 E. Cambridge, viola; James E. Mooney, 1909 W. Monte Vista, clarinet; and Fred Bradford, Yuma, French horn. All three won scholarships to the school after auditions before the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the famed school and its attendant Berkshire Music Festival. Music-minded Phoenicians raised funds to aid the three during their New England stay.

The annual Berkshire Festival will open next Sunday, when Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony, conducts the first of three weekend concert programs.

Nine musicians of varying ages and interests will attend the school from Canada. Four come from Israel, two each from the Netherlands and Cuba, and one each from Norway, Italy, Egypt, Brazil, Mexico, and Switzerland.

New York students are most numerous, with an expected 88 at the school. Massachusetts ranks second with 49 students, while Pennsylvania is third with 40 students.

YOUNG MUSICIANS will study orchestral playing and conducting under Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Seymour Lipkin, and Howard Shanet. Composition will be taught by Aaron Copland and Luigi Dallapiccola, and chamber music will be supervised by Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Jean Bedetti, Ralph Berkowitz, Fernand Gillet, and Ruth Posselt.

Hugh Ross will teach choral conducting and singing, and all phases of opera will be studied under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. Lipkin will direct the analysis of classical and modern works and Augustus D. Zanzig will teach a new subject, music for the educator. Katharine Wolff will teach solfege.

First three weekend programs will be devoted to the music of Bach, Haydn, and Mozart, each performed at two concerts.

Nine concerts in Tanglewood's music shed will take place during three weekends opening July 26. Distinguished members of the Boston orchestra form half the school's faculty at the music center.

Eight W. Mass. Students To Study at Tanglewood

Lenox, June 23—Thirty-three states and 11 countries are represented in the preliminary list of students for the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center summer school at Tanglewood. With the opening scheduled for July 2, 364 students have been accepted for six weeks of study "on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance," exceeding by more than 100 the enrollment of even date in 1950.

Part of Festival

The school is held in connection with the annual Berkshire Festival, which Charles Munch, music director of the Boston orchestra, will open July 7 with the first of three weekend programs of two concerts each of the music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart, by members of the orchestra, to be followed on three weekends beginning July 26 with nine concerts in Tanglewood's music shed by the full orchestra.

Nine musicians of varied ages and special interests will come from Canada, four from Israel, two each from Holland and Cuba and one each from Norway, Italy, Egypt, Brazil, Mexico and Switzerland. New York leads the states, with 88, including 50 from New York City; Massachusetts is second with 46; Pennsylvania is third with 40, Illinois fourth with 29, Ohio fifth with 15.

They will study orchestral conducting and playing under Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Seymour Lipkin and Howard Shanet; composition under Aaron Copland and Luigi Dallapiccola; chamber music with Gregor Piatigorsky, William Kroll, Jean Bedetti, Ralph Berkowitz, Fernand Gillet and Ruth Posselt.

Also choral conducting and singing with Hugh Ross; all phases of opera with a faculty headed by Boris Goldovsky; solfege with Katharine Wolff; analysis of classical and modern works under Seymour Lipkin and "music for the educator," a subject added to the curriculum this season, under Augustus D. Zanzig. Distinguished members of the Boston orchestra form half the school faculty.

Students from Western Massachusetts are Sara S. Hoff, 47 Herman St., Springfield, contralto in the opera department; Stephen Podgorski, Jr., 67 Fairview Ave., West Springfield, bass trombone to play in the opera orchestra; Henry Wegiel, 46 Primrose St., Indian Orchard, studying choral conducting; Richard E. Cormier, 11½ North Main St., Orange, trombone; Joseph Pizzonia, 8 Lyric St., bassoon, and Robert Coleman, viola, both of Pittsfield; Fred W. Lord, 75 Lewis St., Great Barrington, tenor, who will sing in the festival chorus and Christiana Cardillo, 149 Pleasant St., to study opera.

ARTHUR FIEDLER (left), conductor and founder of the Esplanade Concerts, talks things over at the start of the 23d season with Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the dressing rooms of the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Embankment. Munch was an unexpected visitor at the opening concert on July 1, thoroughly enjoyed himself.

ALL EARS—Elizbeth Thornton, 2, and her brother, John 4, were part of the audience of 7,000 on opening night. A threat of rain which never arrived kept the attendance to about half the expected throng. The concerts continue nightly until July 21, except on Mondays.

The World of Music

By William J. Swank

Because of the lateness in reactivating the Detroit Symhony orchestra for 1952, backers of the orchestra have been unable to obtain a permanent conductor for the season. Instead they have signed six conductors to wield the baton for the 18 concerts.

Dimitri Mitropoulos, music director of the New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra will conduct one concert as will Dr. Bruno Walter. Jonel Perlea, Romanian conductor of the National Broadcasting Co. Symphony orchestra will conduct six concerts; Paul Paray, of the Pittsburgh Symhony will conduct five, and four will be under the leadership of Victor de Sabata, leading conductor of the La Scala Opera Co., in Milan, Italy.

Walter Poole of Detroit, recently named associate conductor and educational director of the new symphony, will conduct one concert.

Howard Harrington, manager of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, Inc., said violinist Jascha Heifetz would head a list of 11 soloists for next season. He will appear Nov. 1. Other soloists will be announced later, Mr. Harrington said.

Thirty-three states and 11 countries are represented in the preliminary list of students for the ninth session of the Berksire Music center at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony orchestra's summer school near Lenox, Mass. Three hundred sixty-four students have been accepted for six weeks of study on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance, exceeding by more than 100 the enrollment of the 1950 session, officials said.

The school is held in connection with the annual Berkshire festival which Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will open July 7 with the first of three week-end programs of two concerts each of the music of Bach, Haydn and Mozart, by members of the orchestra, to be followed on three weekends beginning July 26 with nine concerts in Tanglewood's music shed by the full orchestra.

The Philadelphia orchestra has been urged to visit Europe this summer for concerts to be conducted by Eugene Ormandy, its permanent conductor. Cities seeking appearances of the orchestra are Paris, Bordeaux and Helsinki. Harl McDonald, orchestra manager, says that a European tour would be possible only if the entire cost were guaranteed by foreign booking agents.

The United States will contribute 500,000 marks to support the Festival of the Arts to be held in Berlin from July 6 to July 30. It will include performances by the leading orchestras, opera and theatrical companies of Europe and is expected to be the chief musical event of the year.

"Music in the Air," the third production of the 1951 season of the St. Louis Municipal opera, is reported drawing large audiences at the theater in Forest park. This is the fourth time the musical has been given at the St. Louis Opera and, because of the fine tunes by Jerome Kern, such as "I've Told Every Little Star," and "The Song Is You," it has become a favorite in St. Louis. It previously was given at the opera in 1933, 1937 and 1944.

An experiment in unwanted large estates is being tried in Ipswich, Mass. with Castle Hill, the former estate of Mrs. Richard T. Crane. Mrs. Crane willed Castle Hill to the trustees of public reservations for use as a music festival center. Six programs will be given on the estate this year, the first of which will be presented July 21 in the Italian garden which will accommodate 1,000 persons.

The New Orleans Opera Assn. has outlined an ambitious program for the 1951-52 season with many top names from the operatic field who will perform many of the favorite operas. The season will open Oct. 11 with "Traviata," with Della Rigal, Brian Sullivan and Robert Merrill.

Other operas booked and their dates are: Oct 25, 26 and 27, "Fledermus" with Regina Resnik, Louis Hunt, Brian Sullivan, Thomas Hayward, John Brownlee, Clifford Harvuot. Nov. 29 and Dec. 1, "Tosca" with Dorothy Kirsten, David Poleri, March 20, 22, "Mignon" with Blaunche Thebom, Marilyn Cotlow, Leopold Simoneau. April 3, 5, "Rigoletto" with Leonard Warren,, Patrice Munsel, Eugene Conley. April 17, 19, "Manon" with Bidu Sayao Anton Dermota, Martial Singher. May 1, 3, "Marriage of Figaro" with Frances Yeend, Adelaide Bishop, Frances Bible, James Pease and Walter Cassel.

BOISE, IDAHO
IDAHO STATESMAN
JUL 1 1951

on Music and Drama

By BILL A. WHEELER

Nezperce people pursed their lips for a long, low whistle when Phyllis Ralstin glided out on the Miss Lewis County pageant stage. They pursed them again in Boise Friday after making a 250-mile cloud of dust to kiss her for winning the Miss Idaho contest with her poise, charm, personality, face, figure, beauty and talent. The folks from the Lewis county seat were pretty hopped up about what the Bert Ralstins' kid had done. "Only happens once in a lifetime in a little burg like ours," one of the townsfolk said. Fact is, any Boisean could add, it happens pretty darn seldom in a slightly bigger burg like this.

Bill Wheeler

The Boise Lions club and each of the communities which sponsored girls in the Miss Idaho pageant could be proud of their efforts, too. Aside from the satisfaction of importance they have given to the naming of a Miss Idaho and entering her in national competition at Atlantic City, the local and state pageants have done much more than select a single talented beauty. Through these pageants, a lot of people have had their eyes opened to some talent they didn't know existed. Besides that, the addition of talent to what once was a feastboard for the eyes of purists in bathing suit epicure has now encouraged some strictly luscious girls to hunt for latent talent.

What Idahoans have seen and heard in the last two months of talent and beauty pageants has been worth while to the extent that both music and drama groups have discovered new possibilities for their programs. In Boise, Bobbie Albertson with her almost absolute poise, not to mention her other charms, and her eagerness to perform, had won her the favor and interest of the Boise Little Theater as a possible talent recruit for the upcoming season. Nampans were gratified with the opportunity to show off one of Boise valley's finest young student musicians in Barbara White. And Caldwell again favored the pageant crowds with a young lady who wins our nomination as Miss Resourcefulness. Eleanor McCluskey combined her ability to inflate a bathing suit without a wrinkle and her resourceful imagination to produce a classic dance routine last year. This year she turned a baton routine into a sabre dance and the product was good entertainment. Likewise, Miss Albertson had called upon her own imagination for a Hilo Hattie clowning episode that wowed the crowd.

Entrants in the Idaho pageant from southeastern communities gave some excellent accounting. Bettie Carter donned a Pocatello Cardinals baseball outfit ("because no Pilot uniform would fit") and came up with a knockout of a reading of "Casey at the Bat." Maxine Baggett, Miss Burley, came here "not to win but just to have a swell time," and produced a monumental bit of stage presence in her reading of a cutting from "All the King's Men." Beverly Wilson, who as Miss Golden Girl represented Idaho State college, displayed the pageant's outstanding voice. Gloris Stoddard of Montpelier, Miss Bear Lake, performed on the keyboard with finesse in her "Rigoletto's Fantasy."

There is seldom a variety show picked from fields of the home grown that warrants a standing line at the box office as much as the Miss Idaho pageant.

SALVAGE FROM THE WEEK'S POSTALS

Walter L. McKibben of 1905 State street, Boise, will sing tenor in the Berkshire Music center's festival chorus while studying choral conducting at Tanglewood this summer. Thirty-three states and 11 countries are represented in the preliminary list of students for the ninth session of the Berkshire center . . . From coast-to-coast, millions of neighborhood fans are cheering the willing tries of the knee-high guys who play little league baseball. So, says Sol Handwerger, MGM records have announced release of the first recording of "Little League," the official march of little league baseball with Leroy Holmes and his orchestra and the Holmes vocal quartet. On the reverse is "Take Me Out to the Ballgame" . . . Richard Elsasser, who became the youngest musician on record to memorize the complete 219 organ works of Bach, is available for a recital in Boise during two transcontinental tours—November-December 1951, and January-March 1952. He recently assisted Heifetz in Victor recordings, "The Lost Chord" and "Of Men and Music." His agent will receive communications at 711 South Plymouth boulevard, Los Angeles 5, Cal.

NO ITURBI

"I dont aim to be another Iturbi," confessed the owner of the store doing up my purchase, "but I do think I can learn how to play the piano well enough so that I can get a lot of fun making my own music." The store-keeper, a jot or so over the 69 mark continued, "All my life I've worked to build up my business, with no time for things like music. But last spring, I decided I'd get a good teacher and learn how to play the piano. And do you know, Mrs. Tower, I think I'm doing pretty well!"

As the enthusiast described how much he enjoyed his lessons and how much pleasure he got out of practicing, my mind jumped to other adults I have known who have taken the same plunge. The engineer and the organist of my acquaintance studying the viola, and the doctor the clarinet, beginning long after school days, are learning music only because they have a strong urge. Their attitude of mind is a joy to their teachers, for they are really interested. In my experience, their rate of progress is faster than that of a child beginner. And why not?

SUMMER FOR STUDY

But whether a child or an adult, it is my opinion that barring a short concentrated vacation, summer is a wonderful time to peg away at an instrument. Both teachers and pupils stop watching the clock; the pressure is off. One isn't jumping from engagement to engagement, with no time to savor what is on the tongue.

No matter how hot it is, regular daily practice executed with interest and care will yield surprising dividends.

MUSIC STUDY AT TANGLEWOOD

Thirty-three states and 11 countries are represented in the 364 students to begin their summer music study on Monday at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, at Lenox, Mass. The school is held in connection with the annual Berkshire Festival, which Charles Munch, music director of the Boston orchestra, will open on July 7.

The students will study orchestra conducting under Leonard Bernstein, Richard Burgin, Eleazar de Carvalho, Seymour Lipkin and Howard Shanet; composition under Aaron Copland and Luigi Dallapiccola; chamber music with Gregor Piatagorski, William Kroll, Jean Bedetti, Ralph Berkowitz, Fernand Gillet and Ruth Posselt; choral conducting with Hugh Ross; all phases of opera with a faculty headed by Boris Goldovsky, solfege with Katharine Wolff; analysis of classical and modern works under Seymour Lipkin; and "music for the educator," a subject added to the curriculum this season, under Augustus D. Zanzig.

Programs of the festival and student concerts, information on festival tickets and details of membership in the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center will be sent on request to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

JACOB'S PILLOW DANCE FESTIVAL

The dance is an art form so closely allied to music, that music-lovers are almost bound to respect it and enjoy it. Two visits on consecutive summers to Jacob's Pillow Dance Festival prod me to place the enticing facts before the readers of this column.

Ted Shawn has created, at Jacob's Pillow, a dance festival from June 29 until September 1, with public performances by the leading dancers of our day. Friday and Saturday afternoons at 4 o'clock, and Friday and Saturday evenings at 9 o'clock the ample, rustic barn of a theatre takes on vigorous life.

Always the performance includes three types of dancing: ballet, modern interpretive, and ethnic or native dances. This afternoon and evening, the brilliant young stars of the N. Y. City Center Ballet, Nora Kaye, Hung Lang and Diana Adams will be seen in Act 2 of "Giselle," the pastoral scene from "The Lady of the Camelias," with music by Verdi and solo variations to Tschaikowski's music. Richard and Flora Stuart will appear in dances of French, Spanish and popular American styles. Also on the same bill, Hadassah and Co. will offer dances of Israeli and the east.

The week of July 6 and 7, La Meri and ensemble will be the outstanding dancers, in dances of India and Spain. On July 20 and 21, Ted Shawn will himself appear in new solo dances. Also on the program are Josefina Garcia in Latin American dances, and Tanaquil Le Clerc. Also, what a pleasure it would be to see Maria Tallchief, Iva Kitchell and La Meri on Thursday, Friday or Saturday afternoons or Wednesday, Friday and Saturday nights from July 25-28.

If one drives by way of Springfield, stay on route 20, until near the top of Jacob's Ladder, one sees the conspicuous sign, "Jacob's Pillow."

TANGLEWOOD OPENS SUNDAY

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. — The first eventful week of the 1951 Tanglewood season opens Sunday, July 1, as the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center opens, and as Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrive to prepare for their initial concerts, Saturday and Sunday, July 7 and 8, of music by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Serge Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church in Boston, Mass., and trustee of the orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work this Monday, July 2, in each of the five departments. The first of more than 30 musical events performed by the students will take place on Friday evening, July 6, with a concert by the students symphony orchestra, performing in the Music Shed. The popular Sunday morning student chamber music recitals, and the weekly Composers' Forums will also begin next week. These concerts and the others will be attended by Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, and by other students. Last year the total attendance at such student events exceeded 50,000.

Tanglewood Features Haydn This Week-end

A weekend of music by Haydn is scheduled for Tanglewood tomorrow and Sunday. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will present this second of three concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall, tomorrow at 8:15 P. M. and Sunday at 3 P. M. General admission to these concerts is two dollars and is available on the day of each concert at the Tanglewood ticket office.

Saturday evening's concert will present Seymour Lipkin as soloist in Haydn's D Major Piano Concerto and the Symphonie Concertante for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon. Also on the program will be the G Major Symphony (No. 88) and the London Symphony (No. 104).

Sunday afternoon's concert consists of Haydn's violincello concerto, Gregor Piatagorsky as soloist; and the "Clock" (No. 101), "Drum Roll" (No. 103) and "Oxford" (No. 92) Symphonies.

Munch Will Lead Student Orchestra In Concert Tonight

Lenox, July 12—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor of the Berkshire Festival, will lead the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood Friday night at 8:15 in two Debussy Nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Feasts." Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian conductor will take the baton for the second half of the program, when three movements of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" symphony will be played.

Other numbers on the program of French music will be Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," Piero Bellugi, student from Florence, Italy, conducting and Chausson's Poeme for Violin and Orchestra, with Jeanne Sandbank of Boston as soloist and Russell Stanger of Westboro on the podium. Raymond Montoni, student from Bridgeport, will play the viola solo in the Berlioz.

Mr. deCarvalho, one of three guest conductors who have appeared at Tanglewood, is one of the teachers of conducting at the school. He will take the podium for the Aug. 5 concert at the Berkshire Festival.

The concert will be open to the members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose voluntary contributions are made at the Tanglewood office for membership support of the school.

Former Local Man Gets an Island In Kansas Flood

Kingsley W. Given, who resigned from GE's public relations department here last year, has become part owner of an island in Kansas as a result of the floods that have engulfed portions of that state.

In a letter received here yesterday by his son, Bruce, Mr. Given said that the only access to the family dwelling in Manhattan, Kan., is by helicopter. He explained, however, that the family is safely out of the flooded area.

Bruce is spending the summer at 560 South Street and is employed as an usher at Tanglewood. His father is professor of speech at Kansas State College, where he served on the faculty before joining the GE chemical department news bureau in 1945.

While in Pittsfield, Mr. Given was in charge of the chemical department's lecture program. The family lived at 20 South Mountain Road.

Berkshire County Is a Fashion Setting As Hundred Editors Make Week-End Visit

By GERALDINE SHEEHAN

Women all over the United States began learning today about top designers' coming fall and winter fashions as shown against a Berkshire background.

Western Union's teletype machines at Lenox yesterday tapped out 10,000 words of news copy to papers from Boston to Seattle—the first of the reports on some of the new style trends to American and Canadian women by 100 fashion editors who attended Saturday night's showing at Eastover in Lenox.

Under spotlights on the terrace at the Lenox recreation center, New York models displayed the newest dress designs by Tina Leser, Vardin, Carolyn Schnurer and others, hats by John Frederics and Sally Victor, coats by Bellciano and shoes by Palter DeLiso, among other fashions.

Present also were representatives of some of the dress, jewelry and fabric houses which sponsored the week-end visit of the editors. The Berkshire trip was the close of the National Press Week showings in New York. It was intended to relax the newspaper and radio women who were left fagged out after style shows which lasted almost 15 hours each day and their work till early morning hours filing stories about the fashions they had seen.

Strangely enough, New York was probably the only major city not represented among the 100 women editors. Last week's New York showings and the Berkshire trip were limited to "out-of-town" newspapers.

At Tanglewood yesterday afternoon, as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, they viewed the more informal fashions of concert-goers on the sunny lawns.

With the co-operation of the Tanglewood organization, a dozen of the writers interviewed and photographed Berkshire Music Center students from areas covered by their papers—students from Memphis, Akron, San Antonio and other cities. They heard enthusiastic reports from the students, one of whom expressed the opinion that he had learned more at the Tanglewood school in two weeks than he could have learned elsewhere in months of study.

The Berkshire Music Center packed box lunches for the women editors to enjoy before the Haydn concert. Later, they are to receive records of the Haydn Symphony No. 104, the gift of RCA Victor.

Before the fashion show began outdoors under lights, Eastover served a lavish buffet, including an all-New England table, for the visitors. Later, a bar was set up near the swimming pool, and dancing on flagstones there brought the evening to a close. Busses took the editors to the Red Lion Inn at Stockbridge where they spent the night.

Hair Dye Demonstrated

One of the models changed from hair of a sun bronze hue to flame red in a 22-minute Clairol hair dye treatment. Jack Shor, Clairol's public relations director, explained that because of improvements made in 1950, hair can now be bleached, colored and shampooed in a single operation.

In clothes, a trend to elegance, though with simplicity of line, was forecast by Mrs. Edith Gilman of the Skinner fabric firm, and was borne out by the daytime and evening clothes shown by models. It wan noticeable principally in the rich fabrics — heavy satins and velvets — in the textures of wools; and in big, glittering, showy jewelry in rhinestones and pearls accenting suits and dresses and used on the belt or the cuff of a costume, as well as in necklaces and earrings.

Jewel-tone colors—ruby, amethyst and turquoise in festive satins and wools—studded the show. Silk and wool suits were shown in smoky and charcoal shades, in grays, browns and blues. They still have only softly padded shoulders; hips in many are slightly rounded; and skirts, for the most part, are slim and straight, reaching not far below the kneecap. Fuller, longer skirts appeared in dressier, afternoon costumes. The dark suits were highlighted by pastel velour hats, small, brimless and square-sitting. None had veils.

Separates were made up of combinations of velvet and jersey, tulle and jersey and taffeta and satin. With them, models wore classic pumps or sandals with narrow, intricate ankle straps.

Also on view at Eastover was a new Florentine lace silver pattern of Reed & Barton, who presented the editors with a sample of it in a jelly spoon.

Lenox, Mass.

Some 100 fashion editors, representing newspapers from as far as California, Florida and Toronto, had a chance yesterday to see what music lovers are wearing this season at Tanglewood, the site of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Some 1,200 concert-goers filled every available seat in the theater concert hall during the afternoon all-Haydn program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the overflow crowd of 2,600 listened from the well groomed surrounding lawns.

It was an ideal day for a concert at Tanglewood, with Charles Munch conducting. The cloudless blue sky and hot sun forced most of the listeners outside of the concert hall to find shady spots beneath the tall pines and maples. Scores of others, however, stretched out on blankets, or sat in beach chairs and camp stools to absorb the sun.

Brilliant colors dotted the lawns as the majority of the women displayed a variety of summer dresses, mostly backless and sleeveless.

Tanglewood officials have discouraged women from wearing shorts and halters to afternoon concerts and Sunday's crowd failed to produce even one that wasn't dressed to suit the management.

At intermission, the fashion editors interviewed and photographed students from their home cities attending the music center for six weeks. Last night a special train carried the editors to New York before they report back to their home city news offices.

Yesterday's gathering of 3,800 and last night's crowd brought the week end total to 7,600 an increase of 1,200 over the previous week end.

Boston Orchestra Will Present Haydn Program at Tanglewood

Piatigorsky Will Be Soloist Today; Berkshire Events Include Lakeville Horse Show

(Special to The Republican)

Berkshire Hills, July 14—Activities have hit their full stride in the Berkshires, with concerts at Tanglewood, dancing at Jacob's Pillow, golf tournaments, and a horse show scheduled for this next week end, plus teas and other club activities.

Tomorrow afternoon at the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, Director Charles Munch of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present a Hadyn program. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the violincello concerto. The music will include the "Drum Roll," "Clock," and "Oxford." Director Munch received an enthusiastic ovation at his initial appearance last week, giving indications that the Boston orchestra will enjoy its tremendous popularity under its new director as it did while playing under the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

Bernstein Soloist at Sinfonietta Benefit

Leonard Bernstein, noted American born composer, conductor and pianist, will be the featured soloist with the Zimbler Sinfonietta at a special Berkshire concert in the Concert Hall atop South Mountain, Pittsfield, Aug. 6 at 4 P. M., it was announced today by Josef Zimbler, artistic director of the Sinfonietta.

Making his only appearance of the summer season as a soloist, Mr. Bernstein is appearing in a benefit performance with the Zimbler ensemble on behalf of the United Cerebral Palsy Associations of Massachusetts.

With all participating artists and individuals donating their talent, the event is being presented in co-operation with Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge under whose patronage the South Mountain Concert Hall has become widely known for its performances of excellence.

Symphony Opens At Tanglewood

Following the Berkshire Festival concerts in the theatre-concert hall this week end, Charles Munch will open series A of the nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening, July 26, in the music shed. Meantime performances will be given daily by students at the Berkshire Music Center for members of its Friends Society.

This Saturday evening, July 21, Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Orchestra in Mozart's Haffner" Symphony, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings and Symphony in E-flat, while Hugh Ross will take the baton for the "Missa Brevis" with the Festival chorus and Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberta, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Sunday afternoon, Mr. Munch will conclude the Mozart series with the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, the "Prague" Symphony and the Violin Concerto in A-major, with William Kroll as soloist.

This Friday evening, July 20, Leonard Bernstein, conductor, who heads the school's orchestra department, will conduct the second half of the concert by the student's symphony orchestra and students of conducting will occupy the podium for the first half. Students of chamber music will present programs each Sunday morning at 10:30 and E. Power Biggs, Boston Orchestra organist, will give a recital every Saturday at 3. There will be a composers' forum Sunday evening at 8:15 and Friday afternoon (July 27) at 4:30.

Membership cards of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center will admit holders to all of the above performances excepting those by the Boston Orchestra, for which tickets may be purchased at the box office, Tanglewood, Lenox, or England, Brothers, Pittsfield.

MUSIC OF HAYDN HEARD BY 3800 AT TANGLEWOOD

Crowd Is 200 More Than Last Week's Record; Conductor Munch Lauded

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, July 14—The concert by the members of the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch at Tanglewood tonight was devoted entirely to the music of Haydn, an innovation in this series heretofore devoted to Bach and Mozart. Attracting an audience of 3800, 200 more than the record attendance of last week, the music of Haydn apparently carries as much of an appeal as that of the other two masters.

Munch Adds Zest

As conducted by Charles Munch there can be no doubt that it did. He gave it the lightness, zest, and spirit of eternal youth that is inherent in these gay tunes and native rhythms. This was abundantly evident in the opening allagro of the Symphony No. 88 in G Major. And how wonderful it was to hear the familiar largo really taken at that tempo and sustained consistently.

Naturally, the sturdy minuet which followed stood out in stimulating contrast. The spirited finale was a gem in the real Haydn style. It was all fresh, vital and arresting.

Seymour Lipkin, who came to Tanglewood as a student in 1942 and is now a member of the faculty, was soloist in the piano Concerto in D Major. His fleet, facile finger technic gave a crisp clarity to the Haydnesque figuration and his sure sense of rhythm gave it plenty of life. The delightful gypsy rando which closed the piece was a tour de force in this respect.

Lipkin Is Success

Both he and the orchestra did well, too, in the adagio, but this can hardly be called one of the [illegible] great slow movements. Mr. Lipkin was a tremendous success and was still taking bows when we left the hall.

The second half of the program toward its new home on Berkshire [illegible] . . . The Tanglewood management reportedly was a little worried that the troupe of visiting fashion editors might run into some startling fashion notes at yesterday afternoon's concert. But everything turned out all right, the atmosphere being more Schiaparelli than Abercrombie & Fitch . . .

included the Sinfonie Concertante for violin, cello, and bassoon and oboe with Richard Burgin, Samuel Mayes, Raymond Allard and Ralph Gomberg respectively as soloists, and the London Symphony, No. 104.

There has been a change in the program announced originally for Sunday afternoon. After intermission there will be but one symphony instead of two, "The Clock" No. 101 in D Major.

Gregor Piatigorsky At Festival Today

Lenox, July 14—The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood appears tobe headed for a record breaking season. Tonight's Haydn program in the th ater-concert hall set another attendance record, the third in as many programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch.

Final tabulations showed a total of 3800 present as compared to 3600 a year ago. The overflow crowd was far stretched on the spacious lawn and the 1200 seats within the hall were all occupied by music lovers who took advantage of the balmy weather to enjoy the festival.

This attendance tonight is also a record for any one program of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series since they were inaugurated. A week ago the previous opening night figure was shattered and from all indications drawn from ticket reservations the crowd will swell with each succeeding performance. Too, reservations for the main concerts which open in the shed in Thursday, July 26 are already well ahead of any previous season.

And with Gregor Piatigorsky to be the featured soloist on tomorrow afternoon's program which includes Haydn's violoncello concerto in D Major it may be expected that the general admission to the lawns will reach record proportions.

Berkshire Festival

Ovation Accorded Munch at Second Bach Concert

LENOX, Mass., July 8.—The ovation given Charles Munch this afternoon at Tanglewood at the end of the second Bach concert was far different from the reception he received when he made his first entrance last night on the stage of the theater-concert hall for his Tanglewood debut. Although he has completed two full seasons with the orchestra in Symphony Hall in Boston, he had not yet appeared at Tanglewood. This afternoon there was generous applause and many recalls; last night he was greeted with formal courtesy.

As the program proceeded it was possible to notice the increase of cordiality and accumulation of enthusiasm. He had reason, therefore, to be deeply pleased with the response of the huge audiences which attended both concerts. Last night there was an audience of 3,600, the largest Tanglewood opening concert in the theater-concert hall, and this afternoon the audience slightly exceeded the record of last year's first Sunday.

Mr. Munch paid tribute to the memory of his late predecessor, Serge Koussevitzky, with the final chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion." The chorus was chosen from the student body of the Berkshire Music Center, the school Mr. Koussevitzky founded to complement the Tanglewood Festival. Mr. Munch made a few gracious and impressive remarks and asked that there be no applause following the chorus out of reverence for "the great leader, the great master."

This afternoon Hugh Ross conducted the secular cantata "Aeolus Pacified," and Mr. Munch the "Magnificat." Mr. Munch led the ensemble of thirty men in all the other numbers, including the accompaniments to the concerti for three pianos, one of which, in D minor, was played this afternoon and the other, in C major, last night. The soloists were Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. The D minor was much more effective. The soloists were not so restricted as they were on the opening night and the orchestra played with better balance.

Yesterday four of the Brandenburg concerti were played with varying effect. Munch's Bach is steady and sturdy, tending to be vehement where power is required and excessively restrained where quiet was desired. The nature of the auditorium demands certain adjustments with which Mr. Munch may not yet be familiar, but the spirit he injected into the two programs was reflected in the response of the audiences, and he may be said to have passed his initial ordeal triumphantly.

The next two week ends will be devoted to Haydn and Mozart respectively, and then the remainder of the Boston Orchestra moves in to join their colleagues for three weeks of concerts.

Charles Munch Will Conduct Bach Today In 'Tanglewood'

THIS AFTERNOON at 3 o'clock in the Theater-Concert Hall in "Tanglewood," Lenox, Mass., Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1951 season in Tanglewood, will conduct a concert by members of the Boston Symphony. This marks the second Festival concert, the first having taken place last night, opening the Bach-Haydn-Mozart Series of six Programs. Today, Hugh Ross, Choral director, will conduct the Bach Cantata "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus." The Bach Concerto for Three Pianos in D Minor will be played by Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. The Bach "Magnificat" will close the program. In the Chamber Music Hall there will be morning and night programs today. Festival rehearsals are set for July 28, Aug. 4 and Aug. 11 at 10 A.M., open to the public at a small fee. Proceeds are for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

THE BERKSHIRE Music Center, initiated in 1940 by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and founded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in session until Aug. 12, with Aaron Copland, director; Ralph Berkowitz, executive assistant, and Leonard Bernstein in charge of the conducting and orchestral department. The Bach-Haydn-Mozart Concert Series extends through July 22. Concerts in The Shed, Series A, B and C, are Thursday and Saturday nights at 8:15 o'clock and Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock, July 26-Aug. 12.

At the opening concert July 26, the Mozart Funeral Music K477 will be played in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. The program and those of July 28-29, Aug 2, 4, 11, 12, will be conducted by Charles Munch. Eleazar De Carvalho will conduct Aug. 5, when Jorge Bolet will play the Prokofieff Piano Concerto No. 2. Leonard Bernstein will conduct Aug. 9, when Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" will be sung in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Claudio Arrau, pianist, will play the Brahms Second Piano Concerto July 28.

Boston Symphony Conductor Arrives

The 60-year old maestro leaves tomorrow for Tanglewood in Lenox to conduct the Berkshire Festival Concerts made famous by Koussevitsky.

At Tanglewood Munch will dedicate three concerts in memory of Koussevitsky along with the original program as set up by the late conductor. The first memoriam will be next Saturday, the second on July 26 and the third, August 9.

Munch brought back a new composition by Lukas Foss, official pianist for the Boston Symphony. Foss is in Italy on a fellowship at the American Academy in Rome. The composition will be played for the first time at the next symphony season in the fall.

Tanglewood Debut Hailed

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 8.—Charles Munch assumed the leadership of the Berkshire Festival making his Tanglewood debut here this past weekend. That event could well have accounted for the largest crowd ever to attend an opening concert. Ideal weather and the traditional Bach programs may have contributed.

What Munch gave these 3,600 people, two-thirds of whom sat outside the theatre-concert hall, was some of the finest playing yet heard in Tanglewood. Its Bachish character emerged from the intense virility of his interpretations and the rightness of his rhythmic accent and phrasing. The members of the Boston Symphony participating responded with infectious spirit.

The Saturday evening program included the Brandenburg Concertos No. 3, 2, 6, and 4, the Concerto in C for Three Pianos, and a tribute to the late conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, in the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion. The genius of Bach and of Munch created enough variety to sustain interest for two hours of music. The experience was both stirring and exciting, especially in the performances of the Second and Sixth concertos, the latter notable for the viola playing.

Soloists in the Brandenburg concertos included Richard Burgin, violin, Georges Laurent and James Pappoutsakis, flutes, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Roger Voisin, trumpet. Each soloist functioned as a soloist in his own right, thus highlighting the contrapuntal texture of the scores. The audience cheered Mr. Voisin for an exceptionally mellow performance on the "Bach" trumpet of the second Brandenburg.

The piano soloists included Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz, and Bernard Zighera. Their matter-of-fact style presented some contrast to Munch's more dynamic conception of Bach. When they appeared in the Concerto in D Minor in yesterday's program they had tempered their inflexibility with more satisfying results.

Choral music dominated the Sunday afternoon program featuring the secular cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" and the "Magnificat." Phillip Curtin, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, sang in both while Edith Evans, mezzo-soprano sang in the "Magnificat." Hugh Ross conducted the former; Munch the latter. A chorus of Berkshire Music Center students trained by Mr. Ross did especially well with only a week to assemble and train.

Some 2,800 people attended the Sunday program, possibly indicating a more discriminating taste in electing to listen to the choral numbers. They were rewarded by quite musical performances.

Eight Works on Programs Next Week End at Tanglewood

Lenox, July 14—Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, music director, will perform eight works by Mozart next week end at Tanglewood, in two programs of unusual variety. With a chorus from the Berkshire Music Center, the group on Saturday evening, July 21, will present a rare Mass, the "Missa Brevis," K. 192. Soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. This work will be led by Hugh Ross. In the featured work on Sunday afternoon, July 22, William Kroll will be soloist in Mozart's violin concerto in A major.

First Performance

In addition to the Mass, Saturday's concert will include the Haffner Symphony No. 35; the Symphony in E flat, No. 39; the Adagio and Fugue for strings, K. 546; and the Serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K. 525. This performance of the "Missa Brevis" will be the first at the Berkshire Festival concerts.

Next Sunday afternoon's program consists of the Divertimento for strings and two horns, K. 287; the violin concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist; and the "Prague" Symphony, No. 38. These programs of music by the incomparable 18th-century master, Mozart, will conclude the series of six chamber orchestra concerts in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall.

The major Berkshire Festival concerts, held in the larger Music Shed, will begin on Thursday evening, July 26, and will continue for three weks, with concerts on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. Mr. Munch, who has been making his first appearances with his Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct all but two of the Shed concerts; the others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

Information concerning tickets should be addressed to the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. General admission is on sale on the day of each concert, at Tanglewood.

The opera season will open under Boris Goldovsky Tuesday with Mozart's "Impresario," Stravinsky's "Mavra" and Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge." The Berkshire Trio will play early and modern French chamber music Wednesday evening, as a gift of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, and student conductors and Howard Shanet, one of their teachers, will lead the school orchestra Friday evening in its third program of the season.

Today, Hugh Ross, Choral director, will conduct the Bach Cantata "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus." The Bach Concerto for Three Pianos in D Minor will be played by Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. The Bach "Magnificat" will close the program. In the Chamber Music Hall there will be morning and night programs today. Festival rehearsals are set for July 28, Aug. 4 and Aug. 11 at 10 A.M., open to the public at a small fee. Proceeds are for the benefit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Pension Fund.

THE BERKSHIRE Music Center, initiated in 1940 by the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and founded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in session until Aug. 12, with Aaron Copland, director; Ralph Berkowitz, executive assistant, and Leonard Bernstein in charge of the conducting and orchestral department. The Bach-Haydn-Mozart Concert Series extends through July 22. Concerts in The Shed, Series A, B and C, are Thursday and Saturday nights at 8:15 o'clock and Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock, July 26-Aug. 12.

At the opening concert July 26, the Mozart Funeral Music K477 will be played in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. The program and those of July 28-29, Aug 2, 4, 11, 12, will be conducted by Charles Munch, Eleazar De Carvalho will conduct Aug. 5, when Jorge Bolet will play the Prokofieff Piano Concerto No. 2. Leonard Bernstein will conduct Aug. 9, when Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" will be sung in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Claudio Arrau, pianist, will play the Brahms Second Piano Concerto July 28.

Boston Symphony Conductor Arrives

The 60-year old maestro leaves tomorrow for Tanglewood in Lenox to conduct the Berkshire Festival Concerts made famous by Koussevitsky.

At Tanglewood Munch will dedicate three concerts in memory of Koussevitsky along with the original program as set up by the late conductor. The first memoriam will be next Saturday, the second on July 26 and the third, August 9.

Munch brought back a new composition by Lukas Foss, official pianist for the Boston Symphony. Foss is in Italy on a fellowship at the American Academy in Rome. The composition will be played for the first time at the next symphony season in the fall.

Students From Toledo Area Are Enrolled At Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD — The ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center opens here Monday. Among students from 33 states and 11 countries represented are two from Toledo.

The Toledo students enrolled for the full course are James Reichert, 3960 Bancroft St., bass, and Kathlee W. Henry, 3738 Haughton Dr., flute.

In all, 364 students have been accepted for six weeks of study "on an advanced level through experience in actual musical performance," exceeding by more than 100 the enrollment for 1950.

The school is operated in connection with the annual Berkshire Festival, which Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open July 7, with the first of three week-end programs of two concerts each, composed of music by Bach, Haydn and Mozart.

FASHION EDITORS FIND BERKSHIRE SHOW ENJOYABLE

50 From All Parts of Nation See Models Parade at Lenox Resort

Lenox, July 15 — These Berkshire Hills were paid a whirlwind visit over the week end by 50 fashion editors. Boarding tally ho's which are heavily laden with the romantic history of old society which once reigned supreme here, the editors were given a real country ride to Eastover.

Excellent Meal

The guests were treated to a sumptuous supper. Once settled down the fashion editors reclined in easy lawn chairs, doffed hats and shoes and watched the fashions as exhibited by New York models.

Practically every section of the country was represented by the fashion editors and one wondered if they did not leave the Eastover wonderland with more thoughts of the variety and quality of the meal laid before them than they did of the clothing that adorned the models.

One editor who has covered fashion shows in all the fashion centers of Europe and the United States was heard to remark that "this is it." She never thought that she would be seated barefooted, wiggling her toes in the cool of the evening amidst flaming flambeaux and a galaxy of colors topped by a brilliant moon that danced on the blue waters of Eastover's pool to cover a fashion show.

Visit Tanglewood

The group motored to Tanglewood where it joined the record throng to enjoy the Haydn program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

During intermission the editors interviewed students from their particular sectors of the country who are enrolled in the Berkshire Music School.

It is unlikely that the visiting writers gleaned much from the fashion attire of the overflow crowd on the lawn unless they were looking strictly for informal wear.

Haydn, Ideal Weather Draw 3850 to Lenox

Conductor Munch Impresses Tanglewood Music Lovers With Gracious and Relaxed Directing

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, July 15—Ideal weather and the promise of fine music, superbly performed, drew an estimated 3850 people to the all-Haydn chamber music concert at Tanglewood this afternoon. Thousands of people were seated outside the small theater-shed and the crowds resembled a crowded beach.

Conducts Easily

Mr. Munch confirmed the splendid impression he made upon us at the Bach concerts. He conducts easily. His manner is unassuming and gracious, and he appears to enjoy the music. While the Boston Symphony may not be the perfect technical ensemble it has been, there is in the playing a sense of relaxation, instead of the relentless drive which was a trait of its playing during the past few seasons.

Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, was the bright, particular star of the performance this afternoon. Piatigorsky is both a fine cellist and consumate showman and this afternoon he had, in the Haydn "Cello Concerto in D Major," a vehicle which needed both attributes. He received a deserved ovation and at least five recalls after the performance. Surely this concerto is one of the most effective in the repertory. Conductor Munch provided finely integrated collaboration. Both conductor and cellist probed the music for its fine points with the result that it emerged in all its red-blooded beauty.

The program opened with a spacious performance of Haydn's "Symphony No. 103, in E Flat Major," known familiarly as the "drum roll" symphony. The roll occurs at the very opening of the first movement and it has been suggested that Haydn placed it there to alert the audience.

Melodic Gifts

Haydn says what he has to say with a forthrightness which makes his message immediately apparent. The fertility of his ideas never cease to astonish nor do his melodic gifts ever falter. The few somber measures following the drum roll are enormously impressive as prologue to the vivacious dance-like theme which follows. Richard Burgin played the ornamental violin solo in the slow movement beautifully.

The closing symphony was the "Symphony No. 101 in D major," known as "The Clock." It received a performance that almost had the audience on its feet, for the final movement is quite as thrilling as any Haydn ever produced. Conductor Munch seems in absolute sympathy with this music. He keeps it within the required framework and misses not a nuance, however delicate.

Next week end concerts will be devoted to the music of Mozart. The Chorus will be featured in the rarely-heard "Missa Brevis in F Major" Saturday night.

Bach at Tanglewood

'Magnificat' Climaxes Theater-Concert Hall Program, Following 'Aeolus Pacified' and Three-Piano Concerto

By VICTOR PRAHL

Bach's seldom heard secular cantata "Aeolus Pacified," performed at Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon, was a sheer delight from start to finish. Here we have the master in one of his lighter moods, depicting musically the rushing winds, rollicking laughter, the melancholy of autumn, the falling leaves, and the returning sunshine. Here we see what genius can accomplish with the colo voice and the delicate accompaniment of a solo oboe, flute or violin, not to mention the descriptive realism of the mighty winds achieved with the full chorus and orchestra. We hope that Dr. A. F. Muller (1684-1761), for whose name day this delightful work was written, appreciated its many musical subtleties.

Resident Soloists

In this performance they were beautifully realized on the part of all concerned. The soloists in residence are all developing into fine artists. Eunice Alberts' firm contralto voice sounded richer and fuller than ever, one admired anew David Lloyd's impeccable musicianship, and the virile bass voice of James Pease has never been heard to better advantage. Phyllis Curtin, a newcomer, has a lyric soprano voice under admirable control, and she sang all her airs with fine style.

After one of her solos there was an enthusiastic "bravo" from a member of the audience. If the audience in general had been a little more demonstrative in the course of the performance and punctuated the numerous solos with applause the whole cantata would have taken on more of the festive air which is an essential part of such a work. Hugh Ross has accomplished wonders with his newly organized chorus in a short time. He conducted the whole cantata with a loving and expert hand.

Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera, pianists, duplicated their success of the previous evening in another of Bach's concertos for three pianos and strings, the one in D minor. Musical restraint, delicacy of style, and a happy balance of ensemble were evident throughout the piece. Especially fetching was the fugue of the last movement with its crystalline passages of bright running notes.

Stamp of Authority

The highlight of the afternoon, however, was the superb performance of the "Magnificat." What a marvelous work this is for such a concert, with its choruses and solos of moderate length, in vivid contrast of mood and content! Charles Munch infused it with his warmth and understanding, giving each number the stamp of authority, resulting in a performance that surpassed by far any previous rendition we had ever heard.

How wonderful it was to hear the chorus "Sicut Locutus Est" taken at such a deliberate tempo, and how rewarding to hear the final "Gloria Patri," usually a mad scramble for notes, taken slowly with rhythmical solidity, so the five parts could be heard clearly! Mr. Munch reveals Bach as the poet as well as the architect. Also, he brought out the best in all of the soloists, who were the same as in the cantata. The large audience sensed that they had heard something exceptional and gave the conductor and his forces a rousing ovation. It is readily evident that Charles Munch is already a favorite in his new setting.

This week end Haydn makes his debut on this series which in previous years has been devoted exclusively to Bach and Mozart. This afternoon's concert will include three of the "London" symphonies Nos. 103, 101, and 92, with Gregor Piatigorsky playing the Cello Concerto in D major.

33 Events Scheduled At Tanglewood

Thirty-three musical events are planned at Tanglewood for the ninth season of the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass. Beginning Friday evening, July 6 with a symphony orchestra by the students or orchestral music, performances will be open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose contributions support the school.

Leonard Bernstein has cancelled plans for a summer in Mexico in order to assume Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's work as head of the department of orchestral conducting and orchestra, and to conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Aug. 9.

Student programs will include orchestral concerts on Friday evenings at 8:15 in the music shed; three chamber music concerts on Wednesday evenings, beginning July 18, the gift of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; chamber music on Sunday mornings at 10:30; organ recitals by E. Power Biggs, organist for the Boston orchestra; and opera performances.

A few seats are available for the Bach, Haydn and Nozart week ends, when Charles Munch, Boston orchestra music director, will conduct a chamber orchestra composed of its members on three Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 7. Tickets are on sale at the box office, Tanglewood and England Brothers, Pittsfield, for the concerts in the shed by the full orchestra on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons beginning July 26. Details of programs and admission to all events will be mailed by application to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Eight Mozart Works Scheduled For Next Week at Tanglewood

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will play eight works by Mozart next week end at Tanglewood, in two programs of unusual variety. With a chorus from the Berkshire Music Center, the group on Saturday evening, July 21, will present the rare Missa Brevis, K. 192. Soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. This work will be led by Hugh Ross. In the featured work on Sunday afternoon, July 22, William Kroll will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major.

Saturday's concert will include the Haffner Symphony, No. 35; the Symphony in E-flat, No. 39; the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, K. 546; and the Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K. 525. The performance of the Missa Brevis will be the first at the Berkshire Festival concerts.

The Sunday afternoon program for July 22 consists of the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K. 287; the Violin Concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist; and the Prague Symphony, No. 38.

These programs will conclude the series of six chamber orchestra concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall. The major Berkshire Festival concerts, held in the larger Music Shed, will begin on Thursday evening, July 26, and will continue for three weeks, with concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons.

Mr. Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been making his first appearances with his orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct all but two of the shed concerts. The others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

Information concerning tickets should be addressed to the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. General admission is on sale on the day of each concert at Tanglewood.

Bernstein as Soloist

Leonard Bernstein, composer, conductor, and pianist, will be the featured soloist with the Zimbler Sinfonietta at a special Berkshire concert in the concert hall at South Mountain, Pittsfield, Monday, Aug. 6 at 4 p.m. Making his only appearance of the summer season as a soloist, Mr. Bernstein is taking part in a benefit performance with the ensemble.

With all participating artists donating their services, the event is being presented in cooperation with Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, under whose patronage the South Mountain Concert Hall has become widely known.

Annual Festival At Tanglewood Opens on July 7

Despite death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Berkshire Music Festival which he fostered at Tanglewood in Massachusetts is expected to go forward much as originally planned.

Charles Munch, who succeeded Koussevitzky when the latter retired as music director of the Boston Symphony, has cut short his European engagements and is returning this week to open the festival July 7.

Eleazar de Carvalho will lead the concert Aug. 5 as planned and Munch has invited Leonard Bernstein, a protegee of the late conductor, to direct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Bernstein, once Koussevitzky's pupil and later his associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over his late teacher's work in the school, where he will be joined by Aaron Copland, well-known American composer.

THE HARTFORD TIMES. MONDAY, JULY

Bach Music Opens Berkshire Season

JUL 9 1951

"The great leader, the great master and founder of the Berkshire Music Center," as Charles Munch termed him, was not there to open Tanglewood last weekend.

But despite Mr. Munch's pretty words and the moment of standing silence which the audience observed after the final chorus of Bach's majestic "St. Matthew Passion" had been sung in his honor, Serge Koussevitzky could have had no more fitting homage paid him than the two days of Bach that he made possible by creating Tanglewood.

AND IT IS perhaps ironic to report that while Dr. Koussevitzky's memory will remain forever enshirned in the shimmering perfection of the Boston Symphony itself, Dr. Munch's Bach is the finer expression of this great composer.

True, some of the blinding polish and finesse have been from the tonal surface of the orchestra. But if this is so, then it allows more of the true Bachian verve and spirit to pour forth from the depths below.

Of the two full, varied programs the primarily choral one on Sunday afternoon was the poorer. It included the secular cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" ("Aeolus Pacified") conducted by Hugh Ross, head of the choral department, and the Concerto in D Minor for Three Harpsichords and the Magnificat, both conducted by Dr. Munch.

To speak of the cantata and the Magnificat in the same paragraph is blasphemy, for while the latter is magnificent music and was magnificently performed, the secular music drama is German baroque choral writing at its most ponderous and dull.

IN BOTH WORKS, Phyllis Curtin, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, and David Lloyd, tenor, were most capable soloists. The bass, James Pease, displayed a fine technique but simply has no voice.

THE TRIPLE harpsichord concerto and its companion piece, the lovely and contemplative triple concerto in C Major performed Saturday night, were both done, unfortunately but necessarily, on three pianos expertly played by Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. They are both rip-ping, harmonically complex and rewarding works, and they both received compassionate performances.

But it was Saturday evening and its four Brandenburg Concerti (Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 6) that carried Dr. Munch, the orchestra and the entire weekend to overpowering heights.

STARTING OFF with No. 3, the craggy Frenchman stopped this heart in the middle of a beat by presenting a heavy rhythmically unvaried and tonally cloudy performance of this, the gayest of them all (it does not even own an andante movement).

But by the time the Second rollicked into view, it became apparent that that first coronary palpitation, though real, was unwarranted. For here the Boston's old unfailing precision returned. The orchestra opened up, the strands of the design became clean and distinct, and Dr. Munch infused the minutest pinpoints of the tapestry with verve and joy. The incomparable Richard Burgin on the violin, George Laurent on the flute, and Ralph Gomberg on the oboe all contributed superb solo work.

ROGER VOISIN, however, performing the fantastically difficult trumpet solos on an obviously unfamiliar high-key trumpet, was excrutiatingly poor.

Strangely, the top work of the evening which deserved a celebration at least double the one the Second received did not get it at all. This was the 12-man version of the Sixth with Joseph De Pasquale and Jean Cauhape on the solo viola parts.

FOR HERE the performance was utterly big and lucid, every note cleanly and brightly polished and set like a jewel in the grand sweep of an incandescent interpretation. Mr. De Pasquade and Mr. Cauhape were simply tonal perfection itself, and Dr. Munch propelled the grand design along with a breath-taking balance of fire and grace.

After this peak, the Fourth, although glowing with the same inner spirit as the Sixth, seemed inevitably a bit anticlimacteric. Even so, its final presto movement was fiery gem, and again Mr. Burgin and Mr. Laurent were superb.

All honor and a peaceful and satisfied heart should belong to Dr. Munch. The Boston Symphony is in good hands, for who else could keep Bach joyous and glowing in spite of three double bases?—E. C.

Munch to Conduct Tonight

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood for the first time this evening at 8:15. The concert, the second in the weekly series of performances by the student orchestra at Tanglewood, will present a program of French music. Mr. Munch will conduct two nocturnes by Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals."

Eleazar de Carvalho, who is on the faculty at the Music Center, will also conduct tonight. He will lead the orchestra and a student soloist in three movements from Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy." Raymond Montoni will be soloist in the viola part.

On the program will be Ravel's Five Children's Pieces, "Ma mère l'Oye," Piero Bellugi conducting; and Chausson's Poems for Violin and Orchestra, with Jeanne Sandbank, soloist, and Russell Stanger, conductor.

The Friday evening concerts are perhaps the most popular of the student performances. The audience is composed of members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose voluntary contributions help support the work of the summer school for young musicians founded in 1940 by Dr. Koussevitzky.

The office of the Friends is located at the entrance to Tanglewood, and membership at each event is limited only by seating capacity.

In the festival concert Saturday afternoon Mr. Munch will conduct the Haydn Symphony in G major; the same composer's Symphonie Concertante for violin, cello, oboe, and bassoon; the "London" Symphony, and the Haydn Piano Concerto in D major. The Sunday afternoon program, also of Haydn works, will include the Violoncello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and the "Drum Roll," "Clock," and "Oxford" symphonies.

Laud Koussevitzky As Music Center Opens at Tanglewood

The Berkshire Music center will carry on, not without Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the late founder-director, but because of him. Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, a trustee of the Boston Symphony orchestra, told 280 students at the opening of the center at Tanglewood yesterday.

Celebrities who were on hand for the opening of the summer school of music included music educators from several countries. The school will be directed by Leonard Bernstein of Boston, a protege of the late Dr. Koussevitzky, and a faculty board.

Tanglewood's ninth season was opened with a student concert in the concert theater hall, with attendance by invitation.

Charles Munch, who succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony, arrived in Boston by plane from France Saturday and went to Tanglewood today to prepare for the orchestra's Tanglewood concerts which begin next Saturday. He will direct the first of three concerts in memory of Koussevitzky, the first on Saturday and the others July 26 and August 9.

"I hope to carry on in the same spirit as Dr. Koussevitzky," he said.

Brilliant Piatigorsky Outshines Festal Haydn

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Lenox, Mass. — Judging modern presentations of musical classics has always posed more than a problem or two.

In the first place they weren't written for our idea of a concert hall. Secondly, some of the instruments, especially the keyboard family, are greatly changed. Most important of all, art works which were composed for the culturally elect are today enjoyed by the masses. All the differences are refreshing and progressive. Then there is the matter of style, of which more later.

Tanglewood even further complicates the problem. The beauty of the place is so powerful an attraction that you wonder just where music fits into the equation.

FOR INSTANCE, two all-Haydn programs filled the theater-concert hall Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. That means 1,200 people, each time, heard Charles Munch conduct a suitably reduced Boston Symphony Orchestra under ideal conditions. But more than twice that many more bivouacked on the lawns outside and beyond, paying good money for the privilege. You wonder what they heard. Obviously, they heard only vestigial outlines of Haydn. But that is Tanglewood for you, and a music critic's place is inside.

A girl student—it is the student contingent which gives vitality and an eager tension to the place—sat conning a pocket score as Munch played the "G" Major Symphony." One felt like saying: Put away the book. This man plays the notes right onto the page.

IN CONTRAST with conductors who turn notes into tones, handling the raw material with great freedom and plasticity, Munch produces a beautifully etched copper-plate design. One is tempted to say, before your eyes because he leaves you with visual rather than aural images. That is good, for with most people, the eye is more receptive than the ear.

But verbal reductions of music are always dangerous and I do not want to leave the impression that Munch is a score reader. Far from it. He is a sensitive and fastidious artist. He is utterly lacking in the loosely-defined and popular quality known as showmanship, but you feel that he is above it. Certainly it was not missed by his weekend audiences, for he drew thumping, typically Tanglewood ovations.

MUNCH has given the Boston Orchestra new freedom. Always at razor-edge precision and superlatively regimented, it has been articulate by sections and choirs. Instruments were playing rather than men. I feel now that there is a warmth and humanity that did not previously exist.

For elegance and speaking quality, Richard Burgin's tone in the concertino of the "Sinfonie Concertante Op. 84" were so different from any of his previous concert master's solos that you felt you had never heard him play the violin before. Same goes for Samuel Mayes' cello, Ralph Gomberg's oboe and Raymond Allard's bassoon.

But similar refinements are to be noted over the entire ensemble. The "D Major London Symphony" had a wonderful heartiness and esprit. The G Major, which is almost a theme-piece with the Bostonians, has lost nothing under the new baton. Incidentally, Munch knows how to play slowly and keep the music buoyant. That is the kind of texture he is producing.

AS TO STYLE. Everything was proceeding with a sort of festal decorum, until mid-concert Sunday when Gregor Piatigorsky showed up with the "D Major Cello Concerto." Virtuosity was on stage, initially, with the cadenza of the first movement, which up to that time had been sentimental and cloudy with not a few pitch faults. From that point on to the end Piatigorsky decked out his music with all the theatricalism of 20th century concert hall style This bought on a whooping demonstration. It was un-Haydnesque, but they loved it. It was unlike Seymour Lipkin's sparkling Saturday night performance of the "Piano Concerto in D," which they liked a great deal.

Of course, Haydn never heard of a festival and it may be questioned just how clamorous you can get and still be authentic.

Bernstein Will Lead Tanglewood Program Friday

Tanglewood, July 17—Leonard Bernstein, conductor who is heading the orchestra and orchestral conducting department at the Berkshire Music Center, will lead the student orchestra Friday evening in the music shed at Tanglewood in Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony.

The second half of an all-Russian program, it will be preceded by three numbers to be led by students of conducting. Bernardo Federowski of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, will conduct Moussorgsky's "Prelude to 'Khovanstchina' ". Tchaikovsky's "Concerto for Violin in D major will be conducted by Robert Mandell, with Armin Steiner playing the solo. Lorin Maazel will take the baton for Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra with chorus. The chorus will be prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson.

The chamber music group, directed by William Kroll, will give a concert Sunday morning at 10.30, playing Brahms' Quintet in B minor for clarinet and string quartet; Aaron Copland's Vitebsk (Study on a Jewish Theme) for violin, violincello and piano; and Debussy's Quartet in G Minor.

Both performances are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Information will be mailed on request to Tanglewood, Lenox.

Memorial Concert Listed For Maestro

BOSTON (UP)—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived here from a European vacation cut short by the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and announced plans for two memorial concerts for his predecessor.

The concerts will be played during the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood in Lenox, Munch said as he arrived here by plane yesterday.

Leonard Bernstein, one of Koussevitzky's most brilliant proteges, will conduct the orchestra in a third memorial Aug. 9.

TV set within comparative reach of the common borrower, along comes color broadcasting. Only the bars will be able to afford conversion at first and everybody will soon be out of the homes and back in the bars to goggle at the new wonder.

Now a fellow from Chicago informs me that this theatre televising of the fights is undermining all the good work of the Kefauver committee. Fight fans are not only coming to cheer on their favorites; they are coming to bet on them. One place looked like Bank Nite at the Monte Carlo casino during the Murphy-LaMotta fight and theatre managers are worrying themselves sick over it. How are you going to collect a house percentage in the balcony?

Charles Munch gave such a piercing shush noise while asking his orchestra for pianissimo Sunday that the lady behind me stopped talking to her friend and listened to the music. The man is a musical genuis.

00 U.N. Visitors Coming Here Next Month

One hundred United Nations visitors—almost double the number who spent a week end here last summer—are expected to arrive in Pittsfield next month, to be quartered in local homes.

The secretariat workers will come Friday evening, Aug. 3, and remain with their Berkshire hosts till Sunday, attending two Tanglewood concerts as guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Rotary Club, which was named by the Workshop for World Understanding to sponsor this year's visit, is preparing lists of volunteer hosts. Twenty have been secured thus far, including both Rotary members and non-Rotarians, and have promised accommodations for approximately 40 of the U.N. guests.

Hosts for the remaining 60 must still be found. Anyone interested in taking one or more of the visitors for the week end may call John T. Parsons, James E. Stevens or Gerald Gardner, who are in charge of arrangements for the Rotary Club.

By scheduling different hosts and different visitors this year, it is hoped to broaden the contact between the United Nations workers and Berkshire residents. The secretariat employees are being selected in New York by the U.N. Volunteer Services.

Judd, Rosenfeld, Kaplan, Spalding Forum Speakers

LENOX—Speakers at the forum to be held Monday night in Sedgwick Hall for the students and friends of the Berkshire Music Center were announced today.

The group, who will discuss the question: "What Are the Economic and Artistic Prospects for Our American Symphony Orchestras?" will include George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Judge Jacob Kaplan, a trustee of the BSO; Jay C. Rosenfeld, music critic of The Eagle; and Albert Spalding of Great Barrington, noted violinist. Howard Hanmet, who is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, will be the moderator.

The forum, another in the series of Monday evening events at Sedgwick Hall, will start at 8.15.

150 Writers To Arrive Tonight To Visit Resorts, Tanglewood

One hundred fifty fashion writers from 35 states and Canada, who have spent the past week in New York City previewing fall fashions, will lunch at Tanglewood tomorrow and hear the all-Haydn concert by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. Many of them are women's page or radio editors.

Coming from as far as California, Florida and Toronto, and as near as Albany, they represent leading American newspapers, such as the Chicago Sun Times, the Minneapolis Star, the Montreal Gazette, the Post-Intelligencer of Seattle, Wash., and papers in Dallas, Houston and San Antonio, Texas, Knoxville, Nashville and Chatanooga, Tenn., Spokane and Seattle, Wash. The state having the largest representation is Ohio, with 10; the city, Hartford, Conn., with five.

Arriving in two busses at 12.30, they will be presented by the management of the Berkshire Music Center with box lunches, which they will eat in picnic fashion on the grounds. Before the concert they will go on a guided tour of the estate, and will be given an opportunity to meet, if they wish, and to interview music students from the communities they represent. A photographer will take pictures to use in connection with coverage of the trip.

For background material they have received a copy of the illustrated booklet on Tanglewood. They will take home with them, the gift of RCA Victor, an album of the Haydn Symphony No. 104 "London," the closing number of tomorrow's program ,recorded by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood, the late Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The group wil arrive at the Lenox railroad station tonight at 7.30 and will be transported in cars, horses and wagons to Eastover where a fashion show will be held.

The New Haven Railroad will have two of its travel department representatives on hand for the week end. The fashion writers will stay at the Red Lion Inn and tomorrow will be shown Berkshire hotels, inns and resort centers.

Also here representing the New Haven Railroad will be Dwight W. Norris, assistant publicity director; R. D. Johnson, passenger representative; and Edward D. Coakley, formerly of Pittsfield, passenger sales representative.

Haydn Concert Series Opens At Tanglewood This Week End

With a sell-out days in advance for the second week-end of Berkshire Festival concerts, Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Haydn series tonight and tomorrow afternoon for an audience that promises to be larger than that of the opening Bach programs.

Under the direction of Gregor Piatigorsky, director of the chamber music department, and William Kroll, his associate, students of the Berkshire Music Center will give the following concert tomorrow morning with a program that will include a Sextet by Martinu, dedicated to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.

Quartet in E flat major ..... Schumann
Ralph Einstein, piano; Teruko Akagi, violin; Raymond Montoni, viola; Moshe Amitay, violoncello.

Quintet in G minor ..... Mozart
Jeanne Sandbank and Regina Doshay, violin; Maxine Johnson and Neil Shafer, viola; Dorothy Lundgren, violoncello.

Sextet ..... Martinu
(To Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge.)
Betty Barney, Gaylord Browne, violins; Maxine Johnson and Rudy Blitzer, viola; Robert Sayre and Leonard Feldman, violoncello.

The composers will hold their second forum tomorrow evening with the following works, performed by their fellow-students:

Sonatina for Winds .... F. James Brown
Robert Parris, piano.

Sonata in F sharp minor .. Darius Thieme
Adagio Molto for violin and piano, Noel Sarrand
Donald Caldwell, violin.
F. James Brown, piano.

Piano pieces ..... Robert Pitton
Joyce Paull, piano.

Second Trio for Strings (1950) (Lament for Joseph) ..... Robert Parris
Bernard Muller, violin; Raymond Montoni, viola; Moshe Amitay, violoncello.

Madrigal for Chorus (From, We Were Very Young, by A. A. Milne). Raymond Wilding White
Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor.

General admission to the Festival concerts is on sale at the box office.

Student programs are opened to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, to which voluntary contributions for the support of the school may be made at the Friends office at Tanglewood. The grounds will be open at 6 tonight and 12 tomorrow for concertgoers, who are welcome to picnic or buy meals or snacks at the cafeteria.

Busy Season On At Tanglewood

At least one musical event, and sometimes three, is scheduled for nearly every day of the coming week at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Wednesday evening a chamber music concert by the New Music String Quartet, through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress, will be heard.

The concert will be the first of a series of three on succeeding Wednesday evenings open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and by invitation to friends of Mrs. Coolidge, who has made possible a similar series each season since 1946.

Eleazar deCarvalho, Brazilian conductor will conduct the student orchestra in its second concert of the season Friday evening (July 13). Sunday morning the students will play chamber music and hold a "composers' forum" in the evening.

The two Festival concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, will be devoted to the music of Haydn. Saturday night's program will include the Symphonie Concertante for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon, the "London" and B major symphonies and the Piano Concerto in D major, with Seymour Lipkin, piano soloist. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the cello part in the Violoncello Concerto Sunday, when the program will include the "Drum Roll", "Clock" and "Oxford" Symphonies.

The first opera program, to be given under Boris Goldovsky next Tuesday evening, will be Mozart's "The Impresario", Stravinsky's "Mavra" and Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge", all having their first Tanglewood performance.

The Berkshire Trio, whose chamber music performance met Wednesday evening, is one of the series of three, sponsored by the Coolidge Foundation, will feature early French music. The program was chosen to celebrate the founding of Paris 2000 years ago.

Evening performances start at 8:15, afternoon at 3. Voluntary contributions to the Music Center, which constitutes membership in the Friends society, are received at the Tanglewood office. Information will be mailed on request.

Music Notes

Original band music will be played by the Goldman Band in tonight's Guggenheim Memorial Concert at 8:30 in Central Park. The program includes two little known Beethoven works, an Ecossaise and a Polonaise, and works of Mennin, Cowell, Persichetti, Goldman, Bennett and others.

Jazz concerts will be given at 8:30 tonight at the Central Plaza, 111 Second Ave., and the Stuyvesant Casino, 140 Second Ave.

Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Berkshire Music Center's student orchestra in Shostakovitch's fifth symphony tonight at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. Student conductors will direct the rest of the program, which is devoted to Russian music.

CONGRATULATIONS for Raymond Montoni, young Hartford Symphony and Hartt School of Music violist, are extended by Eleazhar De Carvalho, noted Brazilian conductor, at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., for his performance of the viola solos in Berlioz' symphonic work "Harold in Italy." Mr. Montoni, a full scholarship student at the Berkshire Music Center, performed the work under De Carvalho's direction Friday evening with the advanced student orchestra.

Munch To Direct Students In Concert Tomorrow Night

TANGLEWOOD — Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor of the Berkshire Festival, will lead the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood tomorrow evening in two Debussy nocturnes, "Clouds" and "Fetes." Eleagor deCarvalho, Brazilian conductor, will take the baton for the second half of the program, when three movements of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony will be played.

Other numbers on the program of French music will be Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye," Piero Bellugi, student from Florence, Italy, conducting, and Chausson's poeme for violin and orchestra, with Jeanne Sandbank of Boston as soloist and Russell Stanger of Westboro on the podium. Raymond Montoni, student from Bridgeport, Conn. will play the viola solo in the Berlioz.

Mr. deCarvalho, one of three guest conductors who have appeared at Tanglewood, is a teacher of conducting at the school. He will take the podium for the Aug. 5 concert of the Berkshire Festival.

The concert will be open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose voluntary contributions made at the Tanglewood office for membership, support the school.

Week-End Soloists at Festival Score Hit With Large Audience

Piatigorsky's 'Thrilling' Performance Highlights Series—Crowd of 7600 Turns Out for Haydn Program at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—Ideal weather favored the two programs devoted to the works of Joseph Haydn played yesterday afternoon and Saturday night in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. More than 3800 people attended each of the second brace of the season's concerts. Charles Munch played a symphony at the beginning and end of each program and for filling offered the cello concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky in a consummate performance yesterday afternoon and Seymour Lipkin in the D major piano concerto Saturday evening followed by the Sinfonie Concertante in which Richard Burgin was violin soloist, Samuel Mayes, cellist, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon.

The Piatigorsky performance was the most thrilling event in the entire series to date. It was playing in the grand manner, broad and spacious, technically startling, tonally rich and with an over-all comprehension most sympathetically abetted by Munch's accompaniment. The ovation was released with instant spontaneity and he was recalled many times.

Young Lipkin's concerto Saturday evening was technically impeccable. He displayed a limpid and sensitive tone and complete grasp of the style. It was especially gratifying to those who could recall his first appearance at the Berkshire Music Center as a student and his subsequent progress through the various steps of a young artist's career which presently includes his membership on the Center's faculty. The first movement of the concerto, after he found a suitable tempo, was brilliant and the poetry of the slow movement matched it in degree.

Concertmaster Burgin was conspicuously happy in the violin solo variation of the slow movement of the "Drum Roll" symphony yesterday afternoon, as he also had been in the opportunities afforded the violin in the "Concertante" the evening before. There Munch for the orchestra held a little discourse with the solo violin which was charming in its phrasing and inflections. Cellist Mayes made his solos vital, Gomberg's oboe was gracefully suave and Allard's bassoon amazing in its encompassing of his difficult tasks.

Munch chose the G major symphony, No. 88 to open and the D major, No. 104, the "London" to close Saturday night's program. Yesterday afternoon he played the "Drum Roll" and the "Clock," Numbers 103, in E flat major and 101, in D major, respectively, to begin and end that program. The Haydn symphonies are not as fecund for such concentration as they might be and therefore there was not the refreshment that variety can supply in the sequence of numbers. Yet Munch seemed to be more at home, to find more meaty morsels in these pages than had been available to him in the choices of the previous week end.

The orchestra of Haydn's day was a small one and the use of a reduced personnel in this case was not only appropriate but effective. Some details were achieved with skill and delicacy; others were given cursory readings. The overall effect was of genuine and honest artistry. The ensemble played with warm and alert responsiveness and seemed ready and eager to give all that might be required of them.

Three One-Act Comedies Scheduled At Tanglewood

The opera season at the Berkshire Music Center will open tomorrow night with three one-act comedies: "The Impressario" by Mozart, "Mavra" by Stravinsky and "Comedy on the Bridge" by Martinu. Boris Goldovsky, on leave of absence for the season of 1950, has returned to Tanglewood to direct the opera department. He will furnish the necessary commentary.

Mr. Goldovsky is assisted by Miss Sarah Caldwell for music and stage direction; Jan Meyerowitz, Paul Ulanowsky and Felix Wolfes, repertoire; G. Philippe deRosier, scenic design Leo VanWitsen, costume design and make-up, and Robert Collington Ackart, technical direction.

The part of the impressario will be played by Raymond Smolover; Madame Herz by Eloise Stoughton; Mr. VanWitsen, who has also designed the costumes; and Mademoiselle Silberklav by Jacquiline Bazinet. The story is that of an impressario who is auditing two singers and in the process is caught between two schools of singing.

Mavra, a peasant farce derived from Pushkin, has to do with a prospective son-in-law who disguises himself as a female cook. In the cast will be Phyllis Curtin as Parasha; Gene Cox as Vassily, the Hussar; Miss Alberts as Parasha's mother; and Sara Hoff as a neighbor.

The scene of "Comedy on the Bridge" is laid at the boundary of a river separating two countries in middle Europe. Civilians find themselves caught in a kind of "No man's land," with confusion as to nationality. The cast includes Georgiana Bannister as Josephine; James Pease as Eva, the brewer's wife; David Lloyd, the schoolmaster; James Joyce, the enemy sentry; Ernest Eames, the friendly sentry; Lawrence Avery, Colonel

Charles Munch Opens Bach Series At Festival

The Berkshire Festival concerts proper got under way last evening with Charles Munch replacing the late Serge Koussevitzky as the conductor of the opening Bach series, the concluding concert of which will be given this afternoon.

Next weekend—Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon—the concerts will be devoted to the music of Haydn. Mr. Munch will conduct the symphony in G major, the Symphonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, obee, and bassoon, the "London" Symphony, and the Piano Concerto in D major. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the solo in the Violoncello Concerto on Sunday's program, which will include the "Drum Roll," "Clock," and "Oxford" Symphonies.

On the following weekend, the two concerts will feature music by Mozart, with William Kroll as the soloist in the Violin Concerto in A major on Sunday afternoon, July 22. The Festival Concerts in the Music Shed, with the full Boston Orchestra participating, get under way on Thursday evening, July 26. This program will include Mozart's Funeral Music (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky), Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and Berlioz Fantastic Symphony, by Berlioz.

We hadn't realized this, but one of the most famous converts to the Catholic faith was born at Tanglewood: Rose Hawthorne, daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne. The Little Red House was her birthplace, and a constant reader sent us a clipping from Concord where Archbishop Richard J. Cushing just dedicated the new $800,000 Catholic school in her honor. Rose was born in 1851, and was described by her father as "a child of spring and spring never vanished from her nature."

In 1891 she and her husband joined the Catholic Church, through the influence of an Irish servant girl. At the age of 45, Rose went to work in a New York public hospital and met the misery of the poor first hand. In 1901 she established the Dominican Congregation of St. Rose of Lima, also known as the Servants for Relief of Incurable Cancer. Rose became known as Sister Alphonsa, and died in 1926 at the age of 76, after 25 years' work for cancer patients at Hawthorne (sic), N.Y.

Juilliard Quartet To Give Willeke Memorial Concerts

The Juilliard String Quartet will present the first of two concerts in memory of Willem Willeke by the South Mountain Association, Saturday afternoon, Aug. 4, at 4 on South Mountain.

The New Music String Quartet of New York will be heard in the second memorial concert, Friday afternoon, Aug. 10, at 4. The new Music String Quartet recently appeared in the chamber music series at Tanglewood.

Three Sunday afternoon concerts, Aug. 26, Sept. 2, and 9 will feature the Busch Serkin Trio, the Berkshire String Quartet with assisting artists, (both these concerts through the generosity of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge), and William Masselos, young Greek pianist.

Tickets for all concerts are without admission charge, and may be had on written application to the South Mountain Association, Pittsfield. A stamped, self-addressed envelope must accompany all requests.

Music at South Mountain exists entirely through voluntary contributions to the South Mountain Association. All those who enjoy the concerts may help continue them by sending their contributions to the South Mountain Association.

Temporary Blood Shortage

Blood Needed

Four more blood donors are needed by two local hospitals to fill a gap in the local supply caused by increased blood shipments to the Korean front.

Twenty-four pints of Type "O" positive blood were needed at Pittsfield General and St. Luke's Hospitals, but nine people volunteered for the former over the week end and 11 for the latter to almost fill the quota. People with Type "O" positive blood are urged to make an appointment for anytime between 9 AM and 4 PM at either hospital.

Speakers: Jay Rosenfeld, Berkshire Eagle music critic; Albert Spalding, violinist and author; George E. Judd, manager, Boston Symphony Orchestra; Judge Jacob Kaplan, orchestra trustee.

Tomorrow Night

Three one-act operatic comedies under direction of Boris [illegible]ovsky. The events are [illegible] to members of the [illegible]kshire Music Center.

Opera Season Will Open Tomorrow

Three One-Act Comedies Scheduled At Tanglewood

The opera season at the Berkshire Music Center will open tomorrow night with three one-act comedies: "The Impressario" by Mozart, "Mavra" by Stravinsky and "Comedy on the Bridge" by Martinu. Boris Goldovsky, on leave of absence for the season of 1950, has returned to Tanglewood to direct the opera department. He will furnish the necessary commentary.

Mr. Goldovsky is assisted by Miss Sarah Caldwell for music and stage direction; Jan Meyerowitz, Paul Ulanowsky and Felix Wolfes, repertoire; G. Philippe deRosier, scenic design Leo VanWitsen, costume design and make-up, and Robert Collington Ackart, technical direction.

The part of the impressario will be played by Raymond Smolover; Madame Herz by Eloise Stoughton; Mr. VanWitsen, who has also designed the costumes; and Mademoiselle Silberklav by Jacquiline Bazinet. The story is that of an impressario who is auditing two singers and in the process is caught between two schools of singing.

Mavra, a peasant farce derived from Pushkin, has to do with a prospective son-in-law who disguises himself as a female cook. In the cast will be Phyllis Curtin as Parasha; Gene Cox as Vassily, the Hussar; Miss Alberts as Parasha's mother; and Sara Hoff as a neighbor.

The scene of "Comedy on the Bridge" is laid at the boundary of a river separating two countries in middle Europe. Civilians find themselves caught in a kind of "No man's land," with confusion as to nationality. The cast includes Georgiana Bannister as Josephine; James Pease as Eva, the brewer's wife; David Lloyd, the schoolmaster; James Joyce, the enemy sentry; Ernest Eames, the friendly sentry; Lawrence Avery, Colonel Ladinsky.

The performance at 8.15 will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

[illegible]eries At Festival

[illegible]roper got under way last evening [illegible]e Serge Koussevitzky as the con[illegible]'s Bach series, the concluding concert of which will be given this afternoon.

Next weekend—Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon—the concerts will be devoted to the music of Haydn. Mr. Munch will conduct the symphony in G major, the Symphonie Concertante for violin, 'cello, oboe, and bassoon, the "London" Symphony, and the Piano Concerto in D major. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the solo in the Violoncello Concerto on Sunday's program, which will include the "Drum Roll," "Clock," and "Oxford" Symphonies.

On the following weekend, the two concerts will feature music by Mozart, with William Kroll as the soloist in the Violin Concerto in A major on Sunday afternoon, July 22. The Festival Concerts in the Music Shed, with the full Boston Orchestra participating, get under way on Thursday evening, July 26. This program will include Mozart's Funeral Music (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky), Schumann's Fourth Symphony, and the Fantastic Symphony, by Berlioz.

We hadn't realized this, but one of the most famous converts to the Catholic faith was born at Tanglewood: Rose Hawthorne, daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne. The Little Red House was her birthplace, and a constant reader sent us a clipping from Concord where Archbishop Richard J. Cushing just dedicated the new $800,000 Catholic school in her honor. Rose was born in 1851, and was described by her father as "a child of spring and spring never vanished from her nature."

In 1891 she and her husband joined the Catholic Church, through the influence of an Irish servant girl. At the age of 45, Rose went to work in a New York public hospital and met the misery of the poor first hand. In 1901 she established the Dominican Congregation of St. Rose of Lima, also known as the Servants for Relief of Incurable Cancer. Rose became known as Sister Alphonsa, and died in 1926 at the age of 76, after 25 years' work for cancer patients at Hawthorne (sic), N.Y.

Tanglewood Opening

LENOX, July 6 — Charles Munch is opening the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this weekend with the first of six programs on three successive weekends by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is music director.

Conducting tomorrow night at 8.15 the Brandenburg Concertos No. 2, 3, 4 and 6 and the Concerto for Three Pianos in C major, he will conclude the Bach series Sunday afternoon at 3 with the Cantata "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus," (Aeolus Pacified). Hugh Ross conducting; the Magnificat, in D and the Concerto for Three Pianos in D minor. Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz will be the trio-pianists. The vocal parts in Sunday's concert will be by Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Edith Evans, mezzo-soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass, of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's Summer school.

The two festival concerts on July 14 and 15 will be devoted to the music of Haydn.

Next week's performances at the school, open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will start with chamber music Sunday morning at 10.30, followed by a composers' forum at 8.15; a chamber music concert Wednesday evening by the New Music String Quartet; a second symphony program by the school orchestra, conducted by students and their teacher, Eleazar de Carvalho; and Sunday morning, July 15, a second chamber music pro[illegible] the school, with a com[illegible] forum in the evening.

Berkshire Festival To Continue

New York (UP)

DESPITE the death of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the Berkshire Music Festival which he fostered at Tanglewood in Massachusetts is expected to go forward much as originally planned.

Charles Muench, who succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky when the latter retired as music director of the Boston Symphony, has cut short his European engagements and is returning to open the festival July 7.

ELEAZAR DE CARVALHO will lead the concert on Aug. 5 as planned and Muench has invited Leonard Bernstein to conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis Aug. 9 in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Bernstein, once Dr. Koussevitzky's pupil and later his associate on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, has returned from Mexico to take over Dr. Koussevitzky's work in the school. Aaron Copland will join him at the school.

THE PHILADELPHIA Orchestra is being urged to visit Europe this summer for concerts to be conducted by Eugene Ormandy, its leader. Bordeaux, Paris and Helsinki are mentioned for appearances if the tour materializes. Harl McDonald, manager of the orchestra, has pointed out, however, that a European tour can be undertaken only if the entire costs are guaranteed by booking agents abroad.

AN AMBITIOUS SEASON has been planned by the New Orleans Opera Association for next fall. It will open Oct. 11 with "La Traviata," featuring Della Rigal, Robert Merrill and Brian Sullivan.

Other performances will be: Oct. 25, 26, 27—"Fledermaus"—Regina Resnik, Lois Hunt, Sullivan, Thomas Hayward, John Brownlee, Clifford Hasvourt. Nov. 29 and Dec. 1—"Tosca"—Dorothy Kirsten, David Poleri. March 20, 22—"Mignon"—Blanche Thebom, Marilyn Cotlow, Leopold Simoneau. April 3, 5—"Rigoletto"—Leonard Warren, Patrice Munsel, Eugene Conley. April 17, 19—"Manon"—Bidu Savao, Anton Dermota, Martial Singher. May 1, 3—"Marriage of Figaro"—Frances Yeend, Adelaide Bishop, Frances Bible, James Pease, Walter Cassel.

AMERICA WILL contribute 500,000 marks to support the Festival of the Arts in Berlin July 6 to 30. It will include perfomances by the leading orchestras, opera and theatrical companies of Europe and is expected to be the chief musical event of the year.

Koussevitzky Honored At Berkshire Festival

LENOX, Sunday (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra last night played a special number in memory of the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, former conductor, at the opening of the Berkshire festival concert.

Charles Munch, successor to the founder of the Berkshire Music Center, was given an enthusiastic reception by the crowd of 3600 as he conducted the "Passion According to St. Matthew," as a tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky.

Munch was making his first appearance with the orchestra at the Summer concert series. He cut short a European concert tour to take over the duties of conductor following the death of Dr. Koussevitzky.

An all-Bach concert will be presented this afternoon.

Two Symphonies on Program At Mozart Concert Tomorrow

Two symphonies, a short mass and an adagio and fugue will be on the program tomorrow evening, when Charles Munch will conduct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the first of two performances of music by Mozart.

The performance will open with the Symphony in D major ("Haffner"), named for a Salzburg merchant who commissioned Mozart to write a serenade to celebrate his daughter's marriage. This serenade was the basis of the symphony that the composer wrote five months later for a concert to be given in Vienna.

The second number will be the Missa Brevis in F major, which Hugh Ross, director of choral work at the Berkshire Music Center, will conduct with the Festival chorus; Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Miss Spector is a student in the opera department who is at Tanglewood this season for the first time. She has sung with the New York City Opera, the New England Opera Theatre and in concert.

Omitting, because of its length, "Eine Kleine Nachmusik," which was originally scheduled for the second half of the program, Mr. Munch will conduct the adagio and fugue for string orchestra and the Symphony in E-flat major. The latter was one of three symphonies composed in a single summer, the others being the G minor and "Jupiter," and probably not performed in his life-time.

While no tickets remain for seats in the hall, general admission will be on sale tomorrow. Tickets for Thursday night, the opening of the nine concerts in the Music Shed, and the succeeding performances by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, are available at the box office at Tanglewood, England Brothers, Pittsfield and the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge.

Tanglewood Creates New Music Department

Blau

Augustus D. Zanzig, left, who heads the new department of music at the Berkshire Music Center, goes over plans for his course with Ralph Berkowitz, dean of the school at Tanglewood.

Augustus Zanzig, Harvard Lecturer, Explains Purpose

TANGLEWOOD—A new department has been created at the Berkshire Music Center this season. Called the department of music for the music educator, it is headed by Augustus D. Zanzig, director of music in the public schools of Brookline and lecturer of music education at Harvard. Its purpose is "to make the wide range of musical experience at Tanglewood available to teachers, so that they may return to their jobs with renewed zest and pass on their knowledge and experience to the young people in their classes."

"We believe," Mr. Zanzig said in discussing his work, "that there is no essential difference between the music at Tanglewood and that taught in the schools, only a difference in degree. There is plenty of good music written by the masters and contemporary composers that is suitable to interest students of elementary and high school age, and even in kindergarten. Young children can be taught to take delight in good rhythm and phrasing and lovely tone quality in simple folk songs, for example. There is no other art or craft in which the unskilled person can come so near being an artist. What constitutes musicianship and how to develop it to be vital and practical is brought out in the seminar meetings, which are limited to 15 students."

Everyone in the music educators' course sings in the Festival chorus and many in the small choir. Some play in the symphonic or opera orchestras, or chamber music, and some are auditors in orchestral or choral conducting. They study harmonic analysis and solfege. Some are professional musicians. The majority are teachers of music in public or private schools, or give private lessons.

"We like to feel," Mr. Zanzig said, "that we are contributing indirectly, through their teachers, to the increased delight and musical growth of young people all over the country. They are urged to look for talent among their pupils."

A graduate of Columbia University, Mr. Zanzig has taken graduate courses in pedagogy at Teachers' College there. He taught secondary piano (to music students of voice or other instrument for whom a knowledge of piano is essential) at the Institute of Pedagogy under Walter Damrosch. He became so interested in the subject of music education that he gave up a career as an artist to teach it. While at Harvard, at the request of the National Recreation Association, for which he was for 16 years director of music, he made a study of amateur music in American life, with funds from the Rockefeller Foundation. A book, "Music in American Life" was a result. He lectured at Tanglewood in 1940.

One of the aims of the course is to make it possible for young music teachers to become familiar with a great deal of contemporary music, especially with that of American composers, and especially such music as can be played and studied by high school and secondary school groups.

Distinguished List

At Tanglewood there is opportunity not only to discuss contemporary works, but to talk with the composers who are teaching composition for six weeks on the grounds. This season they include Luigi Dallapiccola from Italy, Aaron Copland, Leonard Bernstein and Irving Fine, as well as others who attend the Festival concerts. The composers' forums, on Sunday evenings, open also to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, give opportunity to hear the works of their fellow students. Off to a good start, it is expected that as it becomes known, the department will grow until it becomes an effective influence on the teaching and appreciation of music throughout the country.

Berkshire Festival List Features Three Programs of Chamber Music

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 6. — The Berkshire Music Centre announces three concerts of chamber music through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The New Music String Quartet will open the series on Wednesday, to be followed on succeeding Wednesday evenings at 8.15 by the Berkshire Trio on July 18 and the Trio Moyse July 25.

The New Quartet, whose members are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violin; Claus Adam, violoncello; and Walter Trampler, a former Tanglewood student, will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C major by Beethoven.

The Berkshire Trio, composed of Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, both members of the Boston orchestra and the Music Center faculty; and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, will include early French music. They will play the Sonata in G (Antonio Lotti); Sonata in F (Benedetto Marcello); Sonata in C (Haendel); Sonata a trois (J. M. Leclair); Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise (Couperin) and Troisieme Concert (Rameau).

The Moyse Trio, whose players are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis, piano and flute; and his daughter-in-law, Blanche Honegger-Moyse, violin and viola, have selected Trio-sonate en sol majeur (Bach); Duo pour 2 flutes (Haendel); Trio en ut (Haydn-Moyse); Musique en trio (Andre Thiriet); Trois Interludes (Ibert); Trois Petites Pieces en trio (Arthur Honegger); La Chanson pour 2 flutes et violon (Marcel Gennaro); Serenade pour 2 flutes et viola (Louis Moyse) and Trio-Sonate (Martinu).

The concerts will be open to students, friends of the Berkshire Music Centre and the interested public, as have other chamber music programs given through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Foundation each summer since 1946.

Boisterous Audience Fills Hall For Three Operatic Comedies

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD — Three one-act operatic comedies presented last night by Department IV under the direction of Boris Goldovsky of the Berkshire Music Center, attracted an audience larger than could be accommodated within the Theatre-Concert Hall. All three are light and gay and un-intellectual in plot. The singing was brilliant in many cases; the costumes, scenery and lighting were bright, luminous and radiant. It altogether was a joyous frolic.

The entire productions had been developed from scratch since the beginning of the school season only, earlier this very month and for that reason alone should be considered an herculean task. There was no indication, however, that haste or speed, or lack of time, in any way affected the results. The singers, while all youthful, included many who have had much training already at Tanglewood and in other experiences so that it would not be fair to consider that the expert operatic staff of the school started with their vocal material in the same state as the lumber and paints of their stage sets. That does not in any way lessen the degree of their accomplishments and success.

Mozart's "Impresario" has to do with the rivalry of a couple of prima donnas vying for the lead in a new production. Mr. Goldovsky explained in his inimitable graphic way before each opera its essential character and plot.

The Madame Herz of Eloise Stoughton and the Mademoiselle Silberklang of Jacqueline Bazinet were merrily aided by Raymond Smolover's impresario. The jollity of Mozart's music played by an orchestra selected from the student body of the Center was played under Goldovsky's direction with verve and sparkle.

Stravinsky's "Mavra" is a frothy item concocted on what must be stage comic situation No. 1, i.e., for the heroine to disguise her lover in female apparel. The subsequent appearance of trouser legs beneath skirts and the surprise by the young lady's mother at finding the "cook" shaving are certainly enough to indicate the type of wit of the plot. Stravinsky wasn't trying to fool anyone with his music, least of all himself. It is definitely tongue in cheek and the orchestration in the pit was often in the style of "Tubby, the tuba," or its equivalent. The voices were delightful. The vocal line was difficult but Phyllis Curtin as the young lady and Gene Cox as the hussar aided by Eunice Alberts as the mother and Sara Hoff as the neighbor sang with scimitar-sharp style and spirit.

Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge" was slightly more pretentious and called for a cast double in numbers of those preceding which in each case required only a quartet. Martinu wrote this, Goldovsky explained, in 1935, (before his one-year service on the Center faculty) and it was originally intended for the radio. The nature of its plot, however, was so applicable to our present-day futile bickerings that it was "revived" only last year. Very hastily it concerns the marooning on a bridge of a company of people going about their ordinary business while crossing the frontier between two hostile countries. The names of James Pease as the brewer and of David Lloyd as the schoolmaster will indicate the calibre of the vocalists. Their colleagues were Georgiana Bannister as Josephine, Mac Morgan as the fisherman, Edith Evans as the brewer's wife, Lawrence Avery as Colonel Ladinski, and in most amusing roles, James Joyce as the enemy sentry and Ernest Eames as the friendly one.

This Martinu opera was staged and conducted by Sarah Caldwell. In the enthusiastic response following each opera the principals in the preparation and production of the evening's offerings were called to the stage to share with the actors the effusive and happy applause of the boisterous audience.

Berkshire Music Begins With Koussevitzky Honor

Lenox, Mass., July 27—(AP)—Instead of the customary applause some 6,000 persons stood reverently silent last night when Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, concluded his first piece at opening of the Berkshire Musical Festival.

The piece was Mozart's Masonic funeral music, played in honor of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the 77th anniversary of Koussevitzky's birth and the first time he missed the opening of the concerts at Tanglewood's shed since it became a center of music 13 seasons ago.

Berkshire Trio To Give Coolidge Concert

Harpsichordist To Perform With Two BSO Members

TANGLEWOOD—Two members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a harpsichordist famous throughout the United States and Europe form the Berkshire Trio, who will play at Tanglewood tomorrow evening at 8.15 through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress.

The trio will play the sonata in G by Antonio Lotti; sonata in F by Benedetto Marcello; sonata in C by Handel; sonata a trois by J. M. Leclair and troisieme concert by M. P. Rameau. Miss Julia Marlowe will play a harpsichord solo, Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise by Couperin, in celebration of the festival now going on in Paris to commemorate the 2000th anniversary of the founding of Paris.

Miss Marlowe, wife of Leonide Berman, the painter, has come from Easton's Point, near Newport, R.I., where she is practicing between performances. She has brought her harpsichord, a French instrument with a double keyboard, with her.

An ex-pupil of Nadia Boulanger and Wanda Landowska, she appeared at Tanglewood with the Boston Society of Ancient Instruments several seasons ago. She has made many appearances with famous orchestras and chamber music groups, and in solo, and broadcast over the radio in the United States, France and England. She is recording, among many other works, the complete list of Haydn sonatas and Handel and Bach works for harpsichord and flute.

Alfred Zighera, who will play the viola da gamba in the trio, is a member of the Tanglewood faculty. Before joining the Boston Orchestra he played the cello in the Paris orchestra of the late Serge Koussevitzky. He has won first prize at the Paris Conservatory and a croix de guerre with two citations.

George Laurent, flutist, the third member, is also on the faculty at Tanglewood. A graduate at the age of 18 from the Paris Conservatory with first prize, he came to the Boston Orchestra in 1921.

The trio has played together since 1946 in New York, Boston and other cities.

The concert will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and to guests of Mrs. Coolidge by invitation.

TANGLEWOOD CONCERTS

Tanglewood, Lenox, July 11 — A week-end of music by the symphonic master, Haydn, is scheduled for Tanglewood Saturday and Sunday.

Members of the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Charles Munch, will present this second of three series of concerts in the theater-concert hall Saturday at 8.15 and Sunday at 3 o'clock.

Saturday evening's concert will present Seymour Lipkin as soloist in Haydn's "D major piano concerto," and the "Symphonic concertante," for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon. Also on the program will be the "G major symphony" (No. 88) and the "London symphony" (No. 104).

Sunday afternoon's concert consists of Haydn's "Violoncello concerto," Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and the "Clock" (No. 101), "Drum roll" (No. 103), and "Oxford" (No. 92) symphonies.

This summer is the first season in which the concerts preceding the major portion of the Berkshire festival have included a series of all-Haydn programs.

Haydn Numbers This Week End At Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox — A week-end of music by the symphonic master, Haydn, is scheduled for Tanglewood this Saturday and Sunday. Members of the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will present this second of three series of concerts in the theater-concert hall, Saturday at 8.15 and Sunday at 3 o'clock.

Saturday evening's concert will present Seymour Lipkin as soloist in Haydn's D major Piano Concerto, and the Symphonie Concertante, for violin, cello, oboe, and bassoon. Also on the program will be the G major Symphony (No. 88) and the London Symphony (No. 104).

Sunday afternoon's concert consists of Haydn's Violoncello Concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist; and the "Clock" (No. 101), "Drum Roll" (No. 103), and "Oxford" (No. 92) Symphonies.

This summer is the first season in which the concerts preceding the major portion of the Berkshire Festival have included a series of all-Haydn programs. The notion of chamber orchestra concerts here was first utilized in the wartime year, 1943, with a four-concert Mozart series. The next year six such concerts were presented, each program being divided between works by Bach and Mozart. The 1950 season at Tanglewood was the first in which a third series of such chamber orchestra week ends was added. Before his death this June, Serge Koussevitzky asked that a Haydn series be added this season, and Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, decided to carry out the idea. Last week's series of concerts, accordingly, consisted of Bach's music, next week's will be a Mozart series, this week, Haydn's masterpieces will be heard at Tanglewood.

100 Fashion Editors Join 3800 At Tanglewood Haydn Concert

LENOX, July 15 (AP)—Some 100 fashion editors, representing newspapers from as far as California, Florida and Toronto, had a chance today to see what music lovers are wearing this season at Tanglewood, the site of the Berkshire Music Festival.

With 1200 concert-goers filling every available seat in the theater concert hall during the afternoon all-Haydn program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the overflow crowd of 2600 listened from the well groomed lawns surrounding the music hall.

It was an ideal day for a concert. The cloudless blue sky and hot sun forced most of the listeners outside of the concert hall to find shady spots beneath the tall pines and maples.

Scores of others, however, stretched out on blankets, or sat in beach chairs and camp stools to absorb the sun.

Brilliant colors dotted the lawns as the majority of the owmen displayed a variety of summer dresses, mostly backless and sleeveless.

Tanglewood officials have discouraged women from wearing shorts and halters to afternoon concert.

Today's crowd failed to produce even one that wasn't dressed to suit the management.

Today's gathering of 3800 and last night's crowd brought the week end total to 7600, an increase of 1200 over the previous week end.

Haydn-Programm beim Berkshire Musikfest

(Sonderbericht für die "New Yorker Staats-Zeitung und Herold")

LENOX, 15. Juli. Charles Munch dirigierte ein Kammerorchester der Boston Symphonie Samstag abend und Sonntag nachmittags im Theatersaal in Tanglewood, das Programm war Joseph Haydn gewidmet. Seymour Lipkin spielte das Klavierkonzert D-Dur, das letzte der drei Klavierkonzerte Haydns, für "Clavicembalo oder Fortepiano" geschrieben. Einfache Melodien beherrschen den ersten und zweiten Satz, das Soloinstrument tritt niemals wesentlich hervor, es musiziert mit dem Kammerorchester. Im Poco Adagio wird das Thema des Klaviers von der Geige eingeleitet und erst im Schlußsatz "Rondo all' Ungherese" sind brillante Passagen und "Bravura"figuren dem Pianoforte zugedacht. Seymour Lipkin spielte das Werk unter Verzicht auf jede willkürliche Interpretation mit vorbildlicher Einfachheit und Transparenz. Er bringt das Klavier im Poco Adagio zum Singen und läßt die graziösen Themen des Rondo rhythmisch und dynamisch reizvoll erscheinen. Solist und Orchester ergänzen sich, jede Nuance wird stilgetreu gebracht. Vorher dirigierte Charles Munch die Symphonie G-Dur Nr. 88 (1787), ein Kammermusikwerk im schönsten Sinne des Wortes. Der Dirigent betont die Akzente niemals dramatisch, er läßt das Orchester musizieren, die Themen sind klar hervorgehoben. Im Menuett versteht Charles Munch das Rusticale zu betonen, das "Allegro con spirito" war bezaubernd gespielt. — Die Symphonie Concertante in B-Dur für Oboe, Fagott, Geige und Cello stammt aus dem Jahre 1792 und wurde in London im gleichen Jahr erstaufgeführt. Josef Haydn hat das Werk für die Solisten des Salomon Orchesters geschrieben, er folgte dem Concerto Grosso Stil läßt abwechselnd die zwei Gruppen spielen, wobei die vier Soloinstrumente sich oft zu einem Quartett vereinigen.

Die Solisten des Boston Symphonie Orchesters brachten das Werk klangschön zur Wirkung, Ralph Gomberg (Oboe) und Raymond Allard (Fagott) ragten aus dem Ensemble hervor, Richard Burgin (Geige) und Samuel Mayes (Cello) ergänzten das Soloquartett. Den Beschluß des Samstagkonzertes bildete die hervorragende Wiedergabe der D-Dur Symphonie No. 104 (London). Im Programm des Sonntagkonzertes waren die Symphonien No. 103, 101 und 92 sowie das Cellokonzert (Solist Gregor Piatigorsky). Die Veranstaltungen waren ausgezeichnet besucht, mehr als 7000 Personen wohnten den beiden Konzerten bei. Trotzdem ist die Frage aufzuwerfen, ob die Programmgestaltung nicht besser nach anderen Richtlinien aufzubauen wäre. Die erste Serie der Tanglewood Konzerte bringt drei Komponisten, Bach, Haydn und Mozart, jedem von diesen drei Musikern sind je zwei Konzerte gewidmet. Für den Großteil der Hörer wird das Programm einer Veranstaltung ausschließlich von Werken eines Komponisten ermüdend.

Am Samstag nachm. brachte E. Power Biggs Orgelwerke von Händel und Bach in der großen Konzerthalle zum Vortrag. Händels Konzert No. 2 in B-Dur eröffnete das Programm, die Phantasie und Fuge G-Moll sowie die Toccata und Fuge in D-Moll von Bach und Largos e spiccato aus dem D- Moll Konzert (Vivaldi ergänzten das Programm. Kammermusikkonzerte und Veranstaltungen der "Friends of the Music Center" fanden abwechselnd statt. Die Anziehungskraft der Berkshire Festwochen hat seit dem Vorjahr noch zugenommen, das Interesse konzentriert sich nun auf die kommenden Mozart Konzerte und die in Aussicht genommenen Opernvorstellungen (Pique Dame und Ariadne auf Naxos sowie drei Einakter Martinus, Stravinskys und Mozarts).

Munch With Haydn Program On Second Festival Week End

By Paul Giuliani

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Music of Joseph Haydn occupied the attention of music lovers here at Tanglewood for the second week-end pair of concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch.

On Saturday evening the audience heard two of the great symphonies by the eighteenth-century master—No. 88 in G Major and No. 104 in D Major ("London"). Also on the program was the Piano Concerto in D major with Seymour Lipkin of the Music Center faculty as soloist and the Sinfonie Concertante with Richard Burgin, violin, Samuel Mayes, cello, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon, in the solo group.

The sparkle, wit, and delightfully varied humor of these longtime favorites crowded Mr. Munch's interpretations; the minuets of both symphonies rang with a boisterous rustic gaiety in more than usual quickened tempi.

In the Largo movement of the G Major the singing quality was emphasized by a decidedly relaxed conception of the tempo. Aliveness and brilliance characterized the first and last movements of both symphonies, and the occasional ragged tutti passages in the opening movements gave way to precise clarity in both final movements.

As a whole, the great "London" Symphony was a most satisfying performance from a technical as well as musical viewpoint.

Mr. Lipkin's performance of the D major Concerto was clean and entirely pianistic. After momentary indecisions of correct tempo, especially in the first and last movements, there emerged a steadiness of ensemble between piano and orchestra which gave the music a vivifying pulse, a most important factor in these passages of merriment and abandon.

Mr. Lipkin's many scale passages were clean and pearly, executed with crispness and control. The Un Poco Adagio movement was played musically with the phrasing in good taste. The instruments never overshadowed the light pianistic texture and the over-all performance delighted the audience.

Haydn's Sinfonie Concertante, as performed by Mr. Munch and his musicians, could scarcely have had a better interpretation. The four soloists displayed amazing virtuosity with beauty and clarity of tone.

At the end of the first movement the violin, oboe, bassoon, and cello were allowed their first solo display in the spot normally given to the cadenza. After a delightful interchange of melodic by-play the movement comes to a close.

It was not until the third and final movement, however, that a real opportunity was given by Haydn to the solo instruments for any extensive virtuosic demonstration. Each of the men played with clarity, brilliance, and beauty, especially Mr. Mayes on the cello and Mr. Allard on the bassoon. Mr. Mayes' accurate intonation and purity of tone during passages of great velocity were arresting; Mr. Allard's rapid and difficult scale passages emerged cleanly.

For the second concert, played on Sunday afternoon, Mr. Munch and the orchestra opened and closed the program with two more of Haydn's well-known symphonies—No. 103 ("The Drum Roll") and No. 101 ("The Clock").

The main event of the afternoon proved to be a performance of the D major Concerto for Violoncello by Gregor Piatigorsky, head of the Chamber Music Department at the Berkshire Music Center.

In the playing of the opening "Drum Roll" Symphony the audience was treated to that type of near perfection which players of a major orchestra with an eminent conductor sometimes achieve.

One of the greatest symphonic conceptions of Haydn, this symphony derives its name from an ominous, muffled drum roll at the opening and toward the end of the first movement. Each of the four sections was given a masterly treatment in near flawless execution. The contemplative tenderness of the slow movement, the blustering minuet with its ingratiating trio and the spirited finale alive with rippling merriment, were communicated to the audience.

Mr. Piatigorsky followed on a similarly high level with a truly magnificent performance of the three-movement cello concerto. This composition is sometimes attributed to Haydn's cellist, Anton Kraft, who was an amateur composer as well as a great cellist.

It certainly does not seem unreasonable to suppose that at least the unbelievably complicated cadenza passages, especially at the end of the first movement, might be conceived by a virtuoso on the instrument. Intricate figures at every compass of the instrument, including harmonics in double as well as single stopping, require a phenomenal technical facility such as was displayed by Mr. Piatigorsky.

Nor was his amazing virtuosity lacking in musical and artistic significance. His slow movement was full of tender musical meaning; his tone was rich and vibrant at all points on the instrument. His phrasing was clean and the artistic proportion of his dynamics released the music from any sense of ostentation.

Boston Symphony To Open Concert Series July 26

Following the series of Berkshire Festival programs in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood this weekend, Charles Munch will open series A of the nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening, July 26 in the music shed. Meantime performances will be given daily by students at the Berkshire Music Center for members of its Friends' Society.

This Saturday evening, July 21, Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Orchestra in Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings and Symphony in E-flat, while Hugh Ross will take the baton for the "Missa Brevis" with the Festival chorus and Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Sunday afternoon Mr. Munch will conclude the Mozart series with the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, the "Prague" Symphony and the Violin Concerto in A major, with William Kroll as soloist.

The concert in the shed next Thursday will open with Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of the late Serge Koussevitzky, to be followed by Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz. For the latter Mr. Munch commissioned a special set of bells to be cast in France, instead of using the tubular chimes that ordinarily represent church bells. The second program in the shed Saturday evening will include Weber's Overture in "Oberon", Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau, soloist. Series A will close Sunday afternoon with Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal", Aaron Copland's "Quiet City", Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

This Friday evening, July 20, Leonard Bernstein, conductor, who heads the school's orchestra department, will conduct the second half of the concert by the student's orchestra and students of conducting will occupy the podium for the first half. Students of chamber music will present programs each Sunday morning at 10:30 and E. Power Biggs, Boston Orchestra organist, will give a recital every Saturday at 3. There will be a composers' forum Sunday evening at 8:15 and Friday afternoon, July 27, at 4:30.

Billy Bachelor Will Conduct At Berkshire Festival

Due to the unexpected and deeply lamented death of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Charles Munch, his successor as conductor of the Boston Symphony, has cancelled a number of his European engagements, and returned to take over a number of Dr. Koussevitsky's commitments for the Berkshire Music Festival.

The ninth session of the Festival is opening this week, and Dr. Koussevitsky was to conduct members of the Boston Symphony in three pairs of concerts with programs by Bach, Mozart and Haydn, on July 7-8; 14-15; 21-22, Mr. Munch being expected to take over these responsibilities.

Dr. Koussevitsky though experienced abroad in the operatic field, had expected to make his debut in this country as a conductor of opera, on July 30, when Tchaikowsky's opera "Pique Dame," will be given two performances by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center.

There will be nine concerts in the Shed, beginning July 26, with Dr. Koussevitsky's young Brazilian protege, Eleazer de Carvalho, as one of the conductors. The Festival will continue until August 12.

The school's faculty includes: Leonard Bernstein, Burgin, Lipkin, Shanet, Piatigorsky, Kroll, Hugh Ross, Goldovsky, Aaron Copland, and Luigi Dall-apiccola, who is coming to this country for the first time. Students from Baltimore include Barbara and Elizabeth Blaustein, among the group of 400.

Music Panel Opposes Government Subsidies

LENOX—An agreement was reached last night by four panel speakers connected with the world of classical music that large-scale subsidy by federal, state or municipal governments would be unhealthy for the nation's musicians and symphony orchestras.

'Throttling' Seen

Speaking at a weekly series of forum discussions at Sedgwick Hall here, George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Jay C. Rosenfeld, music critic of The Eagle; Judge Jacob Kaplan, a trustee of the BSO; and Albert Spalding, well-known violinist, each in turn stated that subsidy of symphony orchestras and musicians would throttle the development of music in general.

Only exception was taken by Mr. Rosenfeld who said some form of subsidy was necessary for the survival of musical organizations in smaller communities. He suggested that necessary funds for small city orchestras might come through educational institutions. "Music," he declared, "is as much a part of education as the three R's."

As a trustee and vice-president of the BSO, Judge Kaplan said he was very familiar with the problems of adequate compensation for symphony orchestra personnel. And while he was strongly against any form of controlled subsidy, he suggested that the exemption of orchestras as charitable institutions from admission and income taxes might prove an answer to the trouble. "I will go along this far, but no farther," he added.

These were a few of the ideas which came out in a brisk discussion of "What Are the Economic and Artistic Prospects for Our American Symphony Orchestras?" attended by a crowd of more than 400, largely made up of music students, teachers and orchestra personnel from near-by Tanglewood.

Shortages Cited

Possible answers to the question were first given from the managerial standpoint by Mr. Judd who listed a series of shortages currently existing among symphony orchestras. These were shortages of trained musicians, conductors, managers, directing board personnel and, most important, a shortage of money.

New music played by new musicians is needed to satisfy the public, he said. Members of boards of directors should be self-perpetuating and present managers should themselves name their successors, he added. Scarcity of operating funds is never permanent, Mr. Judd stated, and if orchestras maintain their high degree of quality, financial deficits will not be held against them.

That symphony orchestras have survived in the past is a good indication of their future prospects, the BSO manager said. "Their life expectancy is considerably longer than most other forms of entertainment," he concluded.

Attacking the problem from the small-town viewpoint, Mr. Rosenfeld said smaller symphony orchestras are not permitted by their public to perform poorly. He said if this rule was adopted by larger groups there would be no apprehension about the future. Many musicians, Mr. Rosenfeld said, are concerned because they make less money than persons employed at non-skilled labor. This, he added, breeds disloyalty among symphony personnel and creates a need for some form of municipal subsidy.

Discussing the question as a musician, Mr. Spalding, a resident of Great Barrington, declared that confusion exists in a musical world of great possibilities although the situation represents a challenge to the nation's youth. Young musicians, he said, are confronted by a world of monopolies—monopolies created by the musicians and the public. He termed newspaper critics usurpers and warned the young musicians in the audience not to be swayed by what they read. "Major decisions," he exclaimed, "should rest in your own mind. Those who choose a life of music, choose a rich life."

Mrs. Coolidge Shares Spotlight With Chamber Music Artists

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—The second of the three Wednesday evening chamber music concerts being presented at the Berkshire Music Center by Mrs. Coolidge and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress was played last night by the Berkshire Trio, of which Georges Laurent is flute, Alfred Zighera viola da gamba, and Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichord.

Their program was chosen from the composers of the era when their type of instruments was in current use: The Italians Lotti and Marcello, the German Handel and the French Leclair, Couperin and Rameau. While last night's artists made their music perfectly adequate in relation to the size of the Theatre Concert Hall, it is obviously reminiscent of its proper era by reason of the instruments and the musical material. The latter is delightfully quaint and charming but for the first two-thirds of the program proceeded without variation from largo to allegro and largo to allegro.

Mr. Laurent played a modern flute while Zighera used a genuine example of the predecessor of the violoncello and Miss Marlowe a modern reproduction of the pianoforte's counterpart. The ensemble and the tonal unity was a pleasure all the evening, each artist's individual tone being substantial in its particular genre. The tone carried amply to all parts of the hall although there is always the impression when these ancient instruments are played that the artists should wear the costumes and wigs of the day and play in the grand salon of an ancient castle.

Mr. Laurent's sonata of Marcello was played with excellent variety of tone and grace. Mr. Zighera's breadth of phrasing added immeasurably to his Handel sonata. Miss Marlowe's solo suite of Couperin was the most rewarding music of the evening, "Les Fastes de la Grande and Ancienne Menestrandise" consisted of five divisions of distinctive character which Miss Marlowe delineated and made vividly descriptive with the greatest success. This was the only offering of the evening which departed from absolute music and made possible a pictorial role and Miss Marlowe made the most of it. One momentarily forgot the brilliance of her execution while enjoying the ostentatious scenes she was conjuring up.

A delighted large audience gave them a cordial response and, at the end, joined the artists in according Mrs. Coolidge, who had been seated in the first row, genuine homage and tribute. The final concert of this series will be a program next Wednesday evening by the Trio Moyse.

All-Haydn Program At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., July 12 — A weekend of music by the symphonic master, Haydn, is scheduled for Tanglewood Saturday and Sunday. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will present this second of three series of concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall, Saturday at 8:15 and Sunday at 3:00 o'clock.

Saturday evening's concert will present Seymour Lipkin as soloist in Haydn's D major Piano Concerto, and the Symphonie Concertante, for violin, cello, oboe, and bassoon. Also on the program will be the G major Symphony (No. 88) and the London Symphony (No. 104).

Sunday afternoon's concert consists of Haydn's Violoncello Concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist; and the "Clock" (No. 101), "Drum Roll" (No. 103), and "Oxford" (No. 92) Symphonies.

sented by the Chicago Theater of the Air. Miss Addison will fly to Chicago immediately following her appearance at Tanglewood.

"That will be a quick jump," she said "as I have to be in Chicago several hours before my radio appearance for a rehearsal."

Little Time for Hobbies

Miss Addison says that she is finding "very little time" this summer to give to her hobbies which are reading and knitting. She has a number of concerts booked for next fall and winter including an appearance in Springfield in the "Celebrity Series."

"It is always a real joy to sing in my home city," she said.

She is continuing her studies this summer with Mrs. Ruth Ekberg and is spending much time working on the programs for her coming concerts.

Whenever she has a little free time she reads or knits. She says that she has always enjoyed reading and that as a child she feels that she had excellent guidance in the selection of suitable books from Mrs. Meribah K. Brown, popular children's librarian at the Memorial Sq. Branch Library.

Praises Librarian

"I had much more time for reading then than I do now and spent a lot more of my time at the library," she said. "I used to take home a number of books at a time and would read by the hour. I often think of how wonderful Mrs. Brown was to me."

Miss Addison just finished knitting a sweater for the aunt with whom she lives and now has started another sweater. She hopes to get it done before she starts out on her fall concert tour.

Yesterday Miss Addison spoke with deep appreciation of what the Springfield schools did for her. She went to Hooker School, Carew Street for a short time, Chestnut Street Junior High School and Classical High School. From the time she started school her teachers recognized that she had an unusual voice.

"Some of my old teachers tell me that I was outstanding as a singer even when I went to Hooker School," she said laughingly. "I remember that I used to like to sing then but it was not until I entered junior high school that I really began to think of making music my career. I was given a lot of encouragement by Miss Grace L. Wray who taught music at Chestnut Street School at that time and who is now at the Forest Park Junior High School. I owe her a lot."

Miss Addison said that Mrs. Hazel Clark Steiger, who was director of music at Classical High School when she went there, and Dr. William C. Hill, who was principal of the school then, gave her "tremendous help" in achieving her goal of becoming a concert artist.

"I'll do my best to make Springfield proud when I sing Sunday night," she said.

Among the places where Miss Addison is to give concerts this fall are Detroit, Mich., Waterbury, Conn., Worcester, Green Mountain College at Poultney, Vt., University of New Hampshire at Durham, N. H., and the University of Maine at Orono, Me.

Coolidge Concerts Open

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The first of the three Wednesday evening concerts which Mrs. Coolidge and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress are sponsoring at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood proved to be an exciting performance. The New Music String Quartet played Hindemith's quartet in F minor, Opus 10, the Verdi quartet and Beethoven's Opus 59, No. 3. The members of the quartet are Broadus Erle and Matthew Raimondi, violins, Walter Trampler, viola, and Claus Adam, cello.

Hindemith wrote his first quartet at least 20 years before he was a member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty and at a period when he had not yet gone atonal. It was already intricate and involved writing, but beneath the fingers of last night's artists it became exceptionally lucid and transparent. By means of the happy device of dynamic restraint, they allowed each voice to be heard alongside the others with the result that they achieved a rare integration. All the filaments were knit into one live strand, warm and incandescent, clearly articulated, on their four matching Guadagninis.

Rich in Ideas

Hindemith was just bursting with musical ideas at that moment and he pours a wealth of themes into this quartet, all of them interesting, not always without apparent background sources, but all with a flow and urgency which the members of last night's quartet set forth with glowing tone and intensification. Many musicians are not even aware that Verdi ever ventured into chamber music. His sole essay was written in the period just following "Aida" and is of more historical interest than otherwise. It was inevitable that a couple of "arias" should appear during the course of the pages. They were "sung" spaciously and with lovely tone. The other sections of the four movements are enjoyable but make no one wonder why the quartet has not remained in the active literature of chamber music.

It was a pity that the members of the quartet could not recognize that their very virtuosity was luring them, as surely as Lorelei, onto the rocks in the Beethoven quartet. True, they avoided—indeed, were never near—shipwreck, but the speed of the final fugue robbed it of all musical meaning and content. They muffed completely the majestic breadth which Beethoven made possible to expose with any reasonable co-operation.

A Stunt

It was a stunt, to be sure, which few quartets could realize, but one which parallels the boast of the growing youngster who flexes his arm and with innocent pride asks "dee my muscle?" One of the finest pages in chamber music was spoiled. As a matter of fact, the first movement, too, would have gained in depth at a slower pace. One could not fail to marvel at the maintenance of clarity in some of the unhandy and swift passages which Beethoven writes in this section, but with a less rigid drive, subtleties and nuances appear which make this one of the pinnacles of all chamber music. If only the impression made in the Hindemith could have prevailed all the evening!

The next concert in this Coolidge series will be played Wednesday evening when the Berkshire Trio, Georges Laurent, flute, Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, and Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichord, will play a program of early music for their special groups of instruments.

Tanglewood Chamber Music Concerts Slated

Special to The Hartford Times

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. — The Berkshire Music Center announces three concerts of chamber music through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The New Music String Quartet will open the series the evening of July 11, to be followed on succeeding Wednesday evenings at 8:15 by the Berkshire Trio on July 18 and the Trio Moyse July 25.

The New Quartet, whose members are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violin; Claus Adam, violincello; and Walter Trampler, a former Tanglewood student, will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C major by Beethoven.

The Berkshire Trio, composed of Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, both members of the Boston orchestra and the Music Center faculty; and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, will include early French music. They will play the Sonata in G (Antonio Lotti); Sonata in G (Benedetto Marcello); Sonata in C (Haendel); Sonata a trois (J. M. Leclair); Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise (Couperin) and Troisieme Concert (M. P. Rameau).

The Moyse Trio, whose players are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis, piano and flute; and his daughter-in-law, Blanche Honeger Moyse, violin and viola, have selected Trio-Sonate en sol majeur (Bach); Duo pour 2 flutes (Haendel); Trio en ut (Haydn-Moyse); Musique en trio (Andre Thiriet); Trois Interludes (Ibert); Trois Petites Pieces en trio (Arthur Honegger); La Chanson pour 2 flutes et violon (Marcel Gennaro); Serenade pour 2 flutes et violon (Louis Moyse) and Tri-Sonate (Martinu).

The concerts will be open to students, friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public, as have other chamber music programs given through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Foundation each summer since 1946.

Tanglewood Chamber Music

In addition to the Berkshire Festival concerts later this month and in August, and the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series now in progress, there are about 40 other musical events at Tanglewood which the public may attend: operas, song and organ recitals, choral concerts, open orchestra rehearsals, composers' forums—and a great variety of chamber music performed by faculty and students.

One such concert was offered to the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center Sunday morning. Members of the chamber music department, headed by Gregor Piatagorsky and William Kroll, played three exacting works for a large and appreciative audience.

Schumann's Piano Quartet in E-flat, Op. 47, is not a very grateful piece with which to begin a sunny morning. Its scoring is somewhat thick and somewhat monochrome, and the level of its inspiration lies much lower than in the famous Piano Quintet of the same year.

Ralph Einstein, piano; Teruko Akagi, violin; Raymond Montoni, viola, and Moshe Amitay, cello, seemed a little uneasy in the slower sections, but found both blending and verve in the Mendelssohnian Scherzo and the final Vivace, with its strong fugal developments the best movement of the work.

The String Quartet in G minor, K. 516, by Mozart, on the other hand, is the master's greatest chamber music work, and one of the most stirring in the entire literature. It was given a quite remarkable performance for a student group, full of real understanding and sincere feeling. Young Jeanne Sandbank's leadership on the first violin was distinguished, and the entire ensemble, with Regina Doshay, second violin, Maxine Johnson and Neil Shafer, violas, and Dorothy Lundgren, cello, often came close to capturing the tragic intensity of this music.

Bohuslav Martinů's String Sextet (1932) is one of that prolific and uneven composer's finest works, full of color, warmth, and imagination. Betty Barney and Gaylord Browne, violins, Maxine Johnson and Rudy Blitzer, violas, Robert Sayre and Leonard Feldman, cellos, played this rich and vital music with obvious enthusiasm for its strength of rhythm and melodic abandon.

For an ensemble of young artists who may not have known each other a week ago, this was chamber music-making of which their coach, William Krol, may well be proud. K. G. R.

Bach Series At Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox—Charles Munch is opening the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this week end with the first of six programs on three successive week ends by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which he is music director. Conducting Saturday evening at 8.15, Brandenburg Concertos No. 2, 3, 4 and 6, and the Concerto for Three Pianos in C major, he will conclude the Bach series Sunday afternoon at 3 with the cantata "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus," (Aeolus Pacified). Hugh Ross conducting; the Magnificat, in D and the Concerto for Three Pianos in D minor. Irving Fine Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz will be the trio-pianists. The vocal parts in Sunday's concert will be sung by Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Edith Evans, mezzo-soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass, of the Berkshire Music Center, the orchestra's summer school.

The two festival concerts next week end, July 14 and 15, will be devoted to the music of Haydn. Mr. Munch will conduct the Symphony in G major, the Symphonie Concertante for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon, the "London" Symphony and the Piano Concerto in D major. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the solo in the Violoncello Concerto for Sunday's program, which will include the "Drum Roll," "Clock" and "Oxford" Symphonies.

The week's performance at the school, open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will start with chamber music Sunday morning at 10.30.

Serge Koussevitzky

THOUGH he was almost seventy-seven, Koussevitzky was cut off in the prime of life. Until he was removed from public activity last February by his final illness—a complication of leukemia and a virus infection—his energy seemed inexhaustible and his creative force was more vigorous than ever. In the last year of his career he made the rounds of South America and Europe as a guest conductor and took charge of the American tour of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. This summer at Tanglewood he intended to venture into the field of opera for the first time in many years by directing performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" at the Berkshire Music Center. Koussevitzky was the only conductor of his generation who refused to settle down into a comfortable, retrospective old age.

The central secret of Koussevitzky's greatness as a performing musician was his belief that perfection was attainable. When he was a boy in Russia he was awarded a scholarship on the condition that he should learn to play the double-bass. Many musicians sometimes smiled in superior fashion at this spadework out at his home in Brookline; but his recognition of his own shortcomings enabled him in the end to achieve superior performances, because he left nothing to chance or improvisation. When he gave the American première of Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex," for instance, he required the tenor soloist, Arthur Hackett, to rehearse the tricky music of Oedipus with him privately thirty-seven times before he thought they knew it well enough to put it together with the chorus and orchestra.

With a musician of less ardent temperament, such painstaking preparation might have led to performances that were drained of life and enthusiasm. But for Koussevitzky each concert was a new campaign, with a new victory in sight. When the time came to present a work to the public he was suffused with fresh inspirational zeal. The hundredth repetition of a time-worn classic was a première for him, for it provided a chance to realize its meaning more fully than ever before. There was nothing spurious about the exaltation that came into his face as he brought the "Eroica" Symphony or the First Brahms to its peroration.

his incredibly keen ear for texture and color made his performances of Tchaikovsky, Debussy and Ravel unique. In his earlier years in Boston these were the best items in his repertory. But he constantly grew in insight and recreative power, and in his latter years only such supreme masterpieces as Bach's Mass in B minor and the Beethoven symphonies gave him adequate scope. Having settled long ago how "Daphnis and Chloe" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth ought to sound, he kept his interpretation of them unchanged. But the Ninth Symphony and the B minor Mass increased in grandeur and majesty each time he returned to them, and his last performances were touched with sublimity.

Koussevitzky's growth as a man and as an educator kept pace with his growth as an artist. Orchestral conductors are not a generous tribe, and Koussevitzky stood apart from his colleagues in his readiness to help younger musicians in whose talent he had confidence. To him Leonard Bernstein owes much of the impetus of his career, and it is an open secret that Koussevitzky experienced one of his greatest disappointments when the Boston Symphony board refused to agree to the appointment of Bernstein as his successor. William Kapell, Dorothy Maynor, Frances Yeend and David Lloyd are only a few of the gifted artists who were started on their way by Koussevitzky's sponsorship.

American composers owe him as great a debt of gratitude. From the beginning an alert and discriminating propagandist for contemporary music, he began as soon as he reached Boston to hunt out the best new American works and to present them unceasingly to an audience that was not entirely friendly. From Aaron Copland on down the line, the most promising American composers found an eager collaborator in Koussevitzky. The almost unbelievable development of serious American composition in the past generation is due more to the unremitting labors of Koussevitzky than to those of any other man.

FROM TIME TO TIME when they run out of other people's ideas, the movie concocters fall back on the expedient of recasting an old picture and issuing it as a fresh achievement. They select for this purpose either a film so banal that no one is likely to remember it or one so memorable that it may pick up business by reflected reputation. "M," now made anew by Columbia Pictures, belongs to the second category—in fact, it is the ultimate example of that category unless someone decides to star Danny Kaye and Bobby Driscoll in "The Kid." There have been greater movies than the Fritz Lang-Peter Lorre "M" of 1932, but none that was more consistent within itself and with the environment from which it came.

The two versions have one obvious difference: the Lang-Lorre picture was a dream of horror in which the fantasy encompassed not only the hallucinated figure of the child murderer but his victims and pursuers as well; the new film is a realistic chase yarn, featuring police and gangsters, in which the killer alone inhabits a feverish world. That immediately brings up the question of whether or not child-strangling is a suitable theme for screen entertainment;

Tanglewood Opens

No longer is it necessary to go to Europe in the summer for the best in music. In Europe, since the end of the war, summer festivals have been revived or instituted at Florence, Helsinki, Salzburg, Perpignan, Bayreuth and Edinburgh. Perhaps none of these, or of the others now established in this country, has the scope or the standing of Tanglewood.

The Tanglewood season opened last night, with the first of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series in the Theater-Concert Hall; the nine concerts in the big Music Shed will come later this month and in August. But Tanglewood is more than a series of public performances by the expert musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is a summer music center, initiated in 1940 by the late Serge Koussevitzky to provide an opportunity for advanced music study and for experience in group playing in association with a distinguished faculty.

Some 400 students, from most of the states and many foreign countries, are enrolled in the Tanglewood school, creating many problems of housing, feeding, and public relations, as well as those of a social, clerical and instructive nature, both on the grounds and in the town of Lenox. These and other problems require co-operation and imagination within the Festival organization itself, in order to meet the needs of both students and professional musicians as well as those of the patrons who come in droves from near and far to attend the concerts of the masterworks of music.

This year's Festival is being directed by a recently-formed executive committee, of which Aaron Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct most of the concerts this season. The Theater-Concert Hall is 10 years old this season; the Music Shed was first used in 1938, but concerts there were discontinued for four years during the war. The Berkshire Festival has been for some time now the foremost summer musical event in America.

Berkshire Festival Opens on Thursday

The 14th season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed opens this Thursday (July 26) with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday evening at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3:00 o'clock. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5.

Mr. Munch's program for this week includes works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; and Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert. Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to Oberon; continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Sympony; and concludes with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto; the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, will be soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's Overture, The School for Scandal; Aaron Copland's The Quiet City; Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony; and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

In addition, Tanglewood is the campus of a unique school for young musicians, the Berkshire Music Center, which is in its ninth season this summer.

One of the highlights of the more than 30 musical events performed during the 1951 season will be this Friday's program July 27, which will present the work of all departments of the Center in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118; a chamber music group performing Schubert's Trout Quintet; a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion; a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," which was to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's first venture into operatic conducting, in its performances here this summer; and performance of Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, a work especially beloved by Dr. Koussevitzky and commissioned by the Orchestra originally for its 50th anniversay, in 1930.

Berkshire Concert Today Will Be Devoted to Bach

THE first of the Sunday concerts in the Bach-Haydn-Mozart weekend series at the Berkshire Music Festival takes place this afternoon at 3 o'clock, in the Theater-Concert Hall with a program devoted to Bach. The works are: Cantata, "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus," conducted by Hugh Ross; Concerto for Three Pianos, in D minor, played by Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera and Ralph Berkowitz, and Magnificat in D.

Next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon the series will continue with the following Haydn programs conducted by Charles Munch; Saturday-Symphony No. 88, in G-major; Piano Concerto in D-major, Seymour Lipkin, soloist; Symphonie Concertante, for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon; Symphony No. 104, "London". Sunday — Symphony No. 103, "Drum Roll"; Violoncello Concerto, Gregory Piatigorsky, soloist; Symphony No. 101, "Clock"; Symphony No. 92 "Oxford."

Mozart's music will be featured in the pair of concerts Saturday night July 21 and Sunday afternoon July 22. Saturday's program will be: Symphony No. 35, "Haffner"; "Missa Brevis," K. 192, Hugh Ross conducting; "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Adagio and Fugue for Strings, Symphony in E-flat, No. 39. Sunday—Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K.287; Violin Concerto in A-major, William Kroll, soloist; Symphony No. 38, "Prague."

Three in the Shed

The Festival will continue with three weekend concerts by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Shed Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons starting July 26. Munch will conduct all of them except two by Eleazar De Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein.

The programs for the three in Series A follow: Thursday July 26—Funeral Music, K.477, Mozart (In memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Symphony No. 6, Schumann; "Fantastic" Symphony, Berlioz. Saturday—Overture to "Oberon," Weber; Symphony No. 6, Prokofieff; Piano Concerto No. 2, Brahms, Claudio Arrau, soloist. Sunday—Overture, The School for Scandal," Barber; "Quiet City," Coplan; Symphony No. 4, Schubert; Symphony in D-minor, Franck.

Series B opens Thursday Aug. 2 with the following program: Overture to "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, "Pastorale," Beethoven; Rhapsodie Espagnole, Ravel; Symphony No. 3, Roussel. Saturday—"Water Music," Handel; Music for Strings and Percussion, Bartok; "Don Juan," Strauss; Symphony No. 3, with Organ, Saint-Saens. Eleazar De Carvalho will complete the series Sunday afternoon conducting Symphony No. 2, Guarnieri; Piano Concerto No. 2, Jorge Bolet, soloist, Prokofieff; "Pictures at an Exhibition," Moussorgsky-Ravel.

A performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," conducted by Leonard Bernstein in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, will open Series C Thursday night Aug. 9. The soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass. Saturday night Munch will conduct Beethoven's First Symphony, Honegger's Symphony No. 5, and Tschaikowski's Symphony No. 6, the "Pathetique." The final concert Sunday afternoon Aug. 12 will be a Brahms one consisting of his Variations on a Theme by Haydn, the Second and Fourth Symphonies.

BERKSHIRES: With the big week-ends of the Berkshire Festival beginning Thursday evening, New Yorkers will be taking themselves to Tanglewood in droves. To make it easier for them to get transportation and accommodation, at least two local agencies are conducting special tours. Bert Stahl of Ambassador Travel Agencies is offering "package trips" for the fourth successive year. Riverside Tours is also offering prearranged bus tours.

Visitors to the Berkshires will have other concerts to attend besides those at Tanglewood. Elisabeth Schumann is giving lieder recitals on Aug. 2 and 3 in the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge. And Leonard Bernstein is appearing as piano soloist with the Zimbler Sinfonietta on Aug. 6 in the concert hall at South Mountain, Pittsfield.

In the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra complete their eighteenth century series this afternoon. The first of the nine concerts by the full orchestra in the Music Shed will be held next Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoon under Mr. Munch. All departments of the Berkshire Music Center will be represented in a special concert in memory of Serge Koussevitzky on Friday night, when the program will include Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms." The Center's opera department, under Boris Goldovsky, will give Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" Monday and Tuesday nights, July 30 and 31.

The next four regular festival programs under Mr. Munch are:

Today, 3 (Theater-Concert Hall): Mozart, Divertimento for strings and horns (K. 287); Violin Concerto in A major (William Kroll); Symphony No. 38 (Prague).
Thursday, 8:15 (Music Shed): Mozart, Funeral Music (K. 477), in memory of Serge Koussevitzky; Schumann, Symphony No. 4; Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony.
Saturday, 8:15: Weber, Overture to "Oberon"; Prokofieff, Symphony No. 6; Brahms, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Claudio Arrau).
Next Sunday, 3: Barber, Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Copland, Quiet City; Schubert, Symphony No. 4; Franck, Symphony.

Bach-Haydn-Mozart Series Draws 22,900

Lenox, July 22.—The combination of the Mozart program, its interpretation by Charles Munch and William Kroll, as soloist, in the "Violin Concerto in A Major" saw 3550 music lovers disregard threatening clouds to attend on the vast lawns of Tanglewood the final of the six theater-concert hall programs. All told this year the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series has drawn 22,900. Exceptional, indeed, is this attendance when one considers that but 1200 can obtain seats within the hall.

Even to those farthest on the lawns from the hall, this afternoon's interpretation of Mozart's "Divertimento in B-Flat Major for strings and two horns" — Harry Shapiro and James Stagliano—was the finest and most soothing yet heard here in the history of the Berkshire Music Festival.

However, the high point of the program was yet to come, for with the noted Albert Spalding in the audience, William Kroll, a former summer resident of Central Berkshires, was the featured soloist. Mr. Kroll drew a tremendous applause and recall after recall for his fine work.

With this first series now completed, the festival moves into the shed for the beginning of the three series with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra. Thursday night the first program will include Schumann's "Symphony No. 4" and Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony."

The opening number, however, will be Mozart's Funeral Music, which will be conducted by Mr. Munch in memory of the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. This will be the first of two in memory of the late conductor. On Aug. 9 Leonard Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis.

Tanglewood Opens Series With Bach

By CLIF BRADT

The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood opened its preliminary series of Bach-Hadyn-Mozart programs in the Theater Concert Hall over the weekend with a brief but impressive tribute to the late Serge Koussevitzky, who was to have conducted these early concerts in the classical small forms.

The tribute came during the first of the two Bach programs Saturday night and yesterday afternoon with the singing of the final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew."

The few words were voiced by Charles Munch, musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from his conducting platform. There was no thought of turning the concert into a requiem, only the simple, solemn and sincere expression that this great Bach choral works was performed in memory of "the great leader, the great master, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, creator of the Berkshire Music Festival." Not so much as the rustle of a program came from the silent, standing audience at the end.

Otherwise, the festival opened on a pleasant and congenial atmosphere of four Brandenburg Concertos in C Major for Three Pianos and String, to which Mr. Munch brought a warm good humor.

The concert hall was packed to capacity as Mr. Munch raised his baton for the first performance of the festival. Outside, under a crescent moon, hundreds more sat or reclined on the broad lawns in the balmy evening air. The string orchestra played the Brandenburg in G Major with faultless incision, imparting a subtly new flavor under its new conductor. Mr. Munch, who can bring amazing power to the passages of music that call for them, also can endow this sort of Bach with a feeling that is to be enjoyed, with a smile, not knitted brow.

Whether Bach so enjoyed the creation of his prodigious survey of the concerto grosso form, considering his unappreciative patron, the Margrave of Brandenburg, is a question, but certainly these concertos race and rollick intermittently with whispered beauty in every conceivable fashion.

The second Branbenburg in F Major was forthrightly done, with the concertino composed of Richard Bergin, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Roger Voisin, trumpet. Mr. Voisin's work with the little "Bach" trumpet was especially delectable.

The smaller group work, the sixth Brandenburg in B Flat, with its low-register instruments, was suitably endowed with the deeper colors and an excellent final allegro, but perhaps the most resounding of the Brandenburgs was the fourth in G Major.

Here against the strings was a concertino composed of Mr. Bergin and Mr. Laurent again, with James Poppoutsakis as the second flutist. They met one of the most vigorously industrious assignments of the program, especially in the 244-bar fugue, and drew a storm of applause.

In the Concerto for Three Pianos, with Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera as the soloists, the audience seemed determined to stop the concert until an encore was played and forced a long series of bows by the pianists and Mr. Munch. The srting work in the adagio was especially excellent the only weak point of the performance being some lack of piano definition in the first movement.

Bach's vigorous musical drama "Der zurfriedengestellte Aeolus," a cantata of "Aeolus Pacified," opened yesterday afternoon's program, with the soloist Phyllis Curtain, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, and brought the three pianists of the previous evening to the stage again in the Concerto in D Minor for Three Pianos and Strings.

The great Magnificat that Dr. Koussevitsky had planned for the opening took up the entire second half of the second program, with Hugh Ross, who had prepared the chorus work, conducting.

Chattanooga Soprano Wins Scholarship

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn—(SNS)—Miss Mary Robbs, promising 23-year-old Chattanooga soprano, has been awarded a scholarship to the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this summer, it was announced on Friday by J. Oscar Miller, voice teacher at the Cadek Conservatory of Music.

Miss Robbs was recommended for the scholarship by Hugh Ross, director of the Schola Cantorum of New, after an audition held recently.

The talented vocalist is now in New York, and has made application to study at the Juilliard School of Music in the fall. A special scholarship was created so that Miss Robbs could attend the Berkshire Festival.

Mr. Ross explained that when she applied the regular scholarships were filled, but it was decided that her performance was "quite extraordinary and so sincere that we could not afford not to have her."

Miss Robbs won her first major public recognition when she appeared as guest soloist with the Chattanooga Symphony Orchestra last March.

TANGLEWOOD OPENS WITH MUSIC BY BACH

Charles Munch and Hugh Ross Direct as Record Audiences Attend First 2 Concerts

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 8—Record audiences attended the two opening concerts of the 1951 Berkshire Music Festival, held last night and this afternoon in the Theatre Concert Hall. They gave long standing ovations to Charles Munch, the new music director and conductor; Hugh Ross, the choral director; the soloists, the Festival Chorus and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in their all-Bach programs.

Last night, Mr. Munch led the Boston Symphony of thirty-five in the first of the summer's six concerts—the Bradenburg Concertos No. 2, 3, 4 and 6 and the Concerto for three pianos in C major, with Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera as the trio-pianists. The same three artists performed the Concerto in D minor for three pianos and strings this afternoon.

At Saturday night's opening program, 3,600 were present, the largest audience to attend the first night of the "Little Series." Last year's attendance was 2,700.

As with the festival concert series in the main shed, the majority of the listeners were comfortably dispersed over the lawn, taking advantage of the first warm summer night the Berkshires have enjoyed.

After the intermission Saturday night, Mr. Munch announced that in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew" would be sung by the Festival Chorus. He asked the entire audience to stand for a moment of silence at its conclusion.

Mr. Ross opened this afternoon's all-Bach program with "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" ("Aeolus Pacified"), Bach's boisterous and vivacious secular cantata. It was magnificently sung by the Festival Chorus and the four soloists, Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

Mr. Munch then took over the baton to conduct the remainder of the program, the Concerto in D minor for three pianos and strings and the "Magnificat."

This afternoon's attendance was 2,800, bringing the total figure for both programs to 6,400, as compared to last year's 5,400.

Koussevitzky Program Opens Tanglewood

By D. E. RITZ

The Berkshire Festival's 1951 season opened at Tanglewood Saturday night with a Bach program, planned by the late Serge Koussevitzky and conducted by Charles Munch.

The final chorus, from "The Passion According to St. Matthew," was added to the original program and presented in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The huge audience, both inside and outside of the Theater-Concert Hall, stood at the close of the number for a minute of silence in memory of Koussevitzky, founder of the festival.

The balance of the program was presented as planned by Dr. Koussevitzky. It contained the Brandenburg Concertos numbers 3, 2, 6 and 4 and the Concerto in C major for three pianos and strings with Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera as the featured soloists.

The beauty of the Brandenburg concertos was amazing as it developed under the expert conducting of Munch, who has established himself as one of the foremost interpreters of Bach. Of outstanding interest was the concerto number 2 in F major, featuring the solo violin, with concertmaster Richard Burgin playing the part; flute played by Georges Laurent; oboe by Ralph Gomberg and trumpet by Roger Voisin. The trumpet was the focus of attention and Voisin received an ovation for his playing of a difficult part. Shouts of approval marked the close of the number and Munch shared the applause with orchestra and soloists.

The Brandenburg concerto number 3, which opened the program, is written for chamber orchestra and is unique in its two-movement form.

In the concerto for three pianos and strings the featured artists played as one while the Boston Symphony members commented on the themes. The slow movement was particularly impressive.

The final Brandenburg concerto, number 6, was scored by Bach in six individual parts. It was played by 12 of the string players with the continuo part played by the piano. Its viola-predominated coloring was in sharp contrast to that of number 4, which followed. In this two flutes, played by Laurent and James Pappoutsakis, exchanged florid passages with Violinist Burgin for a dramatic close to a program of outstanding interest.

For many, the Saturday program marked a first opportunity to hear Munch direct Bach. That it was no new experience for him was evident from the opening measure. Small wonder, when one realizes that his father, Ernest Munch, and his uncle, Eugene Munch, have been noted for their productions of the cantatas and passions of Bach at Strasbourg and Mulhouse and that Albert Schweitzer, Bach authority, has been a close friend of the family for a number of years.

Festival Chorus Under Hugh Ross Sings With Fine Precision

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, July 21 — The All-Mozart program at Tanglewood tonight by members of the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch and the Festival chorus under Hugh Ross included the Missa Brevis in F (K. 192). This short mass written when the composer was 18, is as the title implies, brief and compact, with little development, and no more repetition of the text than is needed for its musical statement. It often sounded like instrumental rather than vocal music, but highly interesting were the youthful flights into counterpoint, the closely knit part-writing, and the free, spontaneous flow of melody.

Four Soloists

The excellently-trained chorus under the direction of Hugh Ross sang with the precision, secure intonation and musical assurance of fine orchestra players, starting off many of the choruses authoritatively without any orchestra preluding. The soloists, Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, all well known to audiences here, were joined by Gladys Spector, soprano, who with her warm, full, round tones and admirable musically, was a welcome addition to this gifted quartet.

All four were vocally expert and efficient in this exacting music. But it is not music in which the soloist shines as such, for the vocal line is always an integrated part of the work, usually alternating with the chorus. Altogether it was an admirable performance, and it was a wonderful experience listening to this little masterpiece.

Exciting Performance

The concert opened with a really exciting performance of the symphony in D major, "The Haffner" (K. 385). Charles Munch again demonstrated his versatility by being just as revealing in Mozart as he was in Bach and Haydn. In its four movements, there was in turn, an exhilarating vigor, a quiet grace, a rhythmical lift, and an elegance and fiery virtuousity. And there was the authentic Mozart "feel" throughout the symphony. An audience of 5300 received both of these works and their performances ecstatically.

After intermission the orchestra played the Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra (K. 546) and the symphony E flat (K. 543).

Mozart's Music

elegant grace of the minuet, or the light-hearted andante which closed the work.

Kroll Is Soloist

William Kroll, violinist, was the soloist in Mozart's "Concerto in A Major" (k. 219). Mr. Kroll has devoted the greater part of his musical career to chamber music, and thus he was able to bring to this concerto just the needed intimacy. It was forthright violin playing, somewhat lacking in sensuous beauty of tone, but clean-cut and, at times, sparkling. Most effective was the final rondo, with its suggestion of Hungarian rhythms and coloring. The orchestra provided fine collaboration. There were many recalls for Mr. Kroll, which he shared with Mr. Munch and the players.

The program closed with another amazing delineation of a Mozart symphony. This time it was the "Symphony in D Major," known as "The Prague" (k. 504). Last night we heard two magnificent symphonic readings and performances by the players of the "Symphony in D Major No 35" (k. 385), and the "Symphony in E Flat Major" (k. 543). That it was called the "Prague" symphony is probably due to the fact that it was first performed in that city. It was a joyous performance we heard this afternoon. Imaginative, zestful and totally enthralling, it provided a triumphant finale to a series of concerts which have made musical history at Tanglewood and which must have made thousands of new converts to the realm of music.

Festival Crowds Hint Most Successful Season

Lenox, July 21—The Berkshire Festival with Charles Munch conducting appeared to be definitely headed for its most successful season. Tonight's attendance for the first of the Mozart programs was given as 5300, which is 700 less than the record of a year ago. However, to the casual eye, the overflow crowd on the lawn seemed to have reached top proportions.

And 'not withstanding this figure, which incidently is the first during the five concerts to date that has been below last year's, the overall magnitude of the crowds has been most convincing and Mr. Munch has won the hearts of the music lovers. To date there has been a paid attendance of 14,050 for the programs conducted in the theater-concert hall as compared to 11,800 of a year ago over the same span of concerts.

It is also interesting to note that the two Bach concerts of 1950 drew 5400 but this year the attendance swelled to 6400. As for last week's Hayden programs, there were 7650 that passed through the gates of Tanglewood, whereas a year ago the second week end program drew but 1150.

Attending the opening Mozart concert tonight was Mrs. Hemda Asseo of Tel-Aviv, Israel, who is in this country studying the work of youth programs under the exchange plan of the State Department. During her three-day stay in Lenox she is being accompanied by Aaron Copeland of the Berkshire Music School faculty.

Guests of Albert Spalding at tomorrow afternoon's Mozart concert, which will feature William Kroll and the violin concerto in A major, will be Sir Gladwyn Jebb, British UN delegate.

3 Concerts Scheduled at Tanglewood

The New Music String Quartet will be presented at 8:15 p. m. today at Tanglewood in the first of three chamber music concerts to be offered through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation of the Library of Congress. They will be open to students, friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the public.

The other two concerts will be played by the Berkshire Trio next Wednesday and the Trio Moyse July 25.

The New Music Quartet is composed of Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violins; Claude Adam, violincello, and Walter Trampler, former Tanglewood student, viola. They will play the quartets in F Minor by Hindemith, E Minor by Verdi and C Major by Beethoven.

The Berkshire Trio includes Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola de gamba, both members of the Boston Symphony and the Berkshire Center faculty, and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord. Their program will include sonatas and early French music.

The Trio Moyse, comprised of Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis, piano and flute, and his daughter-in-law, Blanche Honegger-Moyse, violin and viola, will play a program ranging from Bach to the moderns.

First Music Shed Concerts At Tanglewood This Week

Charles Munch to Conduct Opening Programs Thursday, Saturday and Next Sunday; Special Music Center Program Friday

Lenox, July 21—The 14th season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed will open Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3.

Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5, and on Thursday, Aug. 9; Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," in honor of Serge Koussevitsky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphon Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood the great musical center it is.

This Week's Programs

Mr. Munch's programs for this week are varied and include works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; and Schumann's fourth symphony and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony will complete the opening concert.

For this performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the orchestra will be using a set of bells specially cast for Mr. Munch in France; the score of the work calls for bells representing those of a church, but it is usually ordinary tubular chimes that are used, instead of real bells.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's overture to "Oberon;" continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's sixth symphony, and concludes with Brahms' second piano concerto with the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, as soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal;" Aaron Copland's "The Quelt City; Franz Schubert's fourth symphony; and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Scene from Opera

One of the highlights of the more than 30 musical events performed during the 1951 season will be Friday's program which will present the work of all departments of the Music Center in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 113; a chamber music group performing Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, and a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion.

Also to be given are a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," which was to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's first venture into operatic conducting, and performances of Beethoven's Egmont" Overture and Stravinsky's "Symphon of Psalms," a work especially beloved by Dr. Koussevitzky, and commissioned by the orchestra originally for its 50th anniversary, in 1930.

The complete performances of "Pique Dame," by the Tanglewood opera department under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, will take place next week, July 30 and 31. The other opera production, aside from a program of three one-act operas staged this past week, will be Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," Aug. 6 and 7. Attendance at these productions is by invitation to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

PIATIGORSKY PLAYS CELLO CONCERTO TO END HAYDN SERIES

Symphonies Also Performed By the Orchestra at Tanglewood

By VICTOR PRAHL

Gregor Piatigorsky's brilliant performance of the cello Concerto in D major gave a lift to the all-Haydn program at Tanglewood on Sunday afternoon. This was the same work he played here with our own orchestra several seasons ago. At first we thought the heat and humidity stifled somewhat the habitual resonance of his tone but as the work progressed he apparently became acclimated to this condition, for the final Allegro was delivered with his customary virtuosity, dash and technical brilliance He aroused the audience to a long and loud demonstration of approval.

London Symphonies

As a composition this work certainly has its banal pages but we can hardly expect a prolific composer like Haydn with his 108 symphonies to be inspired in everything he wrote. Then there are those who seriously doubt the authenticity of this particular work. However, if there is anyone who can play it for all that it is worth it is Mr. Piatigorsky, and this he did at this concert. Charles Munch and the members of the orchestra were as one with the player and shared in his fine success.

There was a touch of realism in the steady tick-tock of "The Clock" in the slow movement of Symphony No. 101 and Mr. Munch's firm down beat served as a dynamic momentum for a highly spirited projection of the first and last movements. The latter was true as well of the Symphony No. 103, the "Drum Roll" which opened the concert. The four symphonies heard at these two concerts are from Haydn's mature period, and the two played on this program were written for his London concerts.

They are for the most part solid of substance, finely balanced, and ingeniously orchestrated, especially in the suggestive contrapuntal pages of the lively finales. Charles Munch played them with all the enthusiasm of discovery and had the full cooperation of his men in giving them the freshness that exuded the real Haydn spirit.

Last Of Series

This afternoon's all Mozart program will be the sixth and last concert of the series in the small shed. It will mark the return of William Kroll, violinist, a favorite soloist of previous seasons who will play the Concerto in A Mayor (K. 219) for violin. The concert will open with the Divertimento in B flat major for strings and two horns (K. 287) and close with the Symphony in D major, "The gue" (K. 504).

Music by Mozart will also figure on the opening concert in the big shed on Thursday night when Mr. Munch will conduct the full orchestra in a performance of this composer's rarely heard Funeral Music (K. 477) in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Completing the program will be Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz.

Berkshire Festival Gets Under Way

Concerts of the Berkshire Festival in the Theater-Concert Hall, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., opened last week. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by its regular musical director, Charles Munch, recently arrived from France.

Though the majority of concerts in the Shed are to be directed by Munch, the concert on Aug. 5 will be led by Eleazar de Carvalho; the concert on Aug. 9 is to be conducted by Leonard Bernstein. This latter program consists of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" to be performed in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Concerts in the Theatre-Concert Hall will be given Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons, until July 22, inclusive. These programs feature music by Bach, Haydn, Mozart. Tickets are still available for all concerts. Further information may be obtained by writing to the ticket office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

MOZART'S MUSIC SUPERBLY DONE AT TANGLEWOOD

Boston Symphony Ends Current Series; New Program Thursday

Springfield Republican July 23

Lenox, July 22 — Lowering clouds somewhat lessened the audience at this final concert of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series, but a total of 355 music lovers were on hand to hear three superlative performances by the Boston Symphony players under the direction of Charles Munch.

Performance, Relaxation

These week end concerts have been notable for their incomparable performances and the air of relaxation and perfect rapport between audience, orchestra and conductor. Charles Munch, when he took over the direction of the orchestra, made what was perhaps the briefest speech on record.

He said to the men: "Gentlemen, we will make joy."

That is just what has been done during these concerts and one may look forward to that same spirit when the concerts in the shed begin this Thursday.

Mr. Munch is quite as at home in the music of Mozart as he has been in the music of Bach and Hadyn. His pacing of each work is exact and his understanding of the musical speech is thorough. Thus, this afternoon, we heard one of the most exquisite performances of the Mozart "Divertimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns," (k. 287) that it has been our good fortune to encounter. The work is almost a concerto for violin, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster, had full opportunity to reveal anew the beauty of his art and his musicianship. We shall not soon forget the ethereal beauty of the adagio, the ment also has had his life saved by these MATS flights. And scores of other civilians, faced with particular emergencies, have been able to turn to the airmen for assistance.

Nothing more supports one's faith in America, and in the things for which this country stands, than these demonstrations by Westover men who, in the line of duty, are going about the job of helping people.

Adele Addison's Advance

One of the most rapidly advancing young concert singers in America is Adele Addison of this city. Born and educated in Springfield, all her musical training has been in this country, further proof that it is no longer necessary to study abroad to attain the top flight vocally, and to achieve success at home.

Miss Addison has been hailed enthusiastically, at recitals in New York and Boston and elsewhere, as well as in the Auditorium here. When she opened the University of Massachusetts concert course last fall she was acclaimed in The Republican as follows: "In a well planned program built on conventional lines that included a group of German, French and English songs there were certain outstanding performances that stamped Miss Addison as one of the best lyric sopranos of our time...Miss Addison makes an artistic entity of each song she sings, but in these bigger songs was that glorious release of the upper voice which in her case carries such a thrill."

After receiving a Bachelor of Music degree at Westminister Choir College she was awarded a scholarship at the Berkshire Music Center, and in 1948 at Tanglewood had the distinction of appearing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the late Serge Koussevitzky's direction. She will sing there again Aug. 9, as soprano soloist in Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" directed by Leonard Bernstein.

Miss Addison is to be heard tonight in a radio broadcast of a Summer Series concert with the NBC Symphony Orchestra, led by Antal Dorati; the other guest soloist will be the 20-year-old pianist, Claudette Sorel. For these young artists, both of whom have been given awards by the National Federation of Music Clubs in the past, it will be the first appearance with this famous orchestra.

Springfield is proud of Adele Addison, for her bearing and personality as well as for her singing. With all the honors that have been hers already, she is still only on the threshold of her career.

Chamber Music Concerts Listed

Lenox, June 29—The Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood announces three concerts of chamber music through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The New Music String Quartet will open the series the evening of July 11, to be followed on succeeding Wednesday evenings at 8.15 by the Berkshire Trio on July 18 and the Trio Moyse July 25.

The New Quartet, whose members are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violin; Claus Adam, violoncello; and Walter Trampler, a former Tanglewood student, will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C major by Beethoven.

The Berkshire Trio, composed of George Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, both members of the Boston orchestra and the Music Center faculty; and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, will include early French music. They will play the Sonata in G (Antonio Lotti); Sonata in F (Benedetto Marcello); Sonata in C (Haendel); Sonata a trois (J. M. Leclair); Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise (Couperin) and Troisieme Concert (M. P. Rameau).

The Moyse Trio, whose players are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis, piano and flute; and his daughter-in-law, Blanche Monegger-Moyse, violin and viola, have selected Trio-Sonate en sol majeur (Bach); Duo pour 2 flutes (Haendel); Trio en ut (Haydn-Moyse); Musique en trio (Andre Thiriet); Trois Interludes (Ibert); Trois Petites Pieces en trio (Arthur Honegger); La Chanson pour 2 flutes et violon (Marcel Gennaro); Serenade pour 2 flutes et viola (Louis Moyse) and Trio-Sonate (Martinu).

The concerts will be open to students, friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public, as have other chamber music programs given through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Foundation each summer since 1946.

HAYDN CONCERTS AT TANGLEWOOD

Programs Saturday Night, Sunday Afternoon

Lenox, July 10—A week end of music by the symphonic master, Haydn, is scheduled for Tanglewood this Saturday and Sunday. Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch will present this second of three series of concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall, Saturday at 8.15 and Sunday at 3.

Saturday evening's concert will present Seymour Lipkin as soloist in Haydn's D major Piano Concerto, and the Symphonie Concertante, for violin, cello, oboe, and bassoon. Also on the program will be the G major Symphony (No. 88) and the London Symphony (No. 104).

Sunday afternoon's concert consists of Haydn's Violoncello Concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist; and the "Clock" (No. 101); "Drum Roll" (No. 103), and "Oxford" (No. 92) Symphonies.

Gregor Piatigorsky At Festival Today

Lenox, July 14—The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood appears tobe headed for a record breaking season. Tonight's Haydn program in the th ater-concert hall set another attendance record, the third in as many programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch.

Final tabulations showed a total of 3800 present as compared to 3600 a year ago. The overflow crowd was far stretched on the spacious lawn and the 1200 seats within the hall were all occupied by music lovers who took advantage of the balmy weather to enjoy the festival.

This attendance tonight is also a record for any one program of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series since they were inaugurated. A week ago the previous opening night figure was shattered and from all indications drawn from ticket reservations the crowd will swell with each succeeding performance. Too, reservations for the main concerts which open in the shed in Thursday, July 26 are already well ahead of any previous season.

Youth Director From Israel To Visit Tanglewood

TANGLEWOOD — Mrs. Hemda Asseo, deputy director of the Youth Section of the Ministry of Education and Culture, and chief of the Israeli Girl Guides in Tel-Aviv, Israel, will arrive in Lenox tomorrow to observe the activities at Tanglewood. Founder and director of the Israeli Training School for Youth Leaders, she is visiting the United States for the first time under the program of the Department of State for the exchange of persons.

On a four-month tour to study the work of youth organizations in the United States, Mrs. Asseo was in Washington for two weeks before visiting communities throughout the country to observe the Scout movement, recreational programs, summer camps, music education facilities, the administration of libraries for young people and other community projects.

A native of Sofia, Bulgaria, Mrs. Asseo received her teachers' certificate from the Tel-Aviv Teachers' Training College and a master's degree from the Hebrew University at Jerusalem. She attended, on a scholarship, the University of London's Institute of Education in 1937-38. Active as a youth leader during her 25 years in Israel, she was appointed secretary general of the Jewish Scout movement in 1943 and in 1945 became head of the youth section of the Tel-Aviv Municipal Education Department, having charge of all extra-curricular and recreational activities for school-age children and leaving these posts in 1950 to assume her present duties. She will remain in Lenox until Wednesday.

Kroll To Play Violin Concerto In Mozart Concert at Festival

Pittsfield Summer Resident Soloist With Boston Symphony Tomorrow— Hugh Ross Will Conduct 'Missa Brevis'

TANGLEWOOD—William Kroll, from 1923 to 1929 a summer resident of Pittsfield, will play the solo in Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major tomorrow afternoon at Tanglewood. The program will be the second of two all-Mozart concerts in which Charles Munch will conduct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end.

Following tonight's program of the "Haffner" symphony, the "Missa Previs," the adagio and fugue for string orchestra and the symphony in E flat, Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra tomorrow afternoon in the divertimento in B flat major, the concerto and the symphony in D major ("Prague"). With all seats in the Theatre-Concert Hall sold for several weeks, general admission will be on sale at the box office before the concerts.

Mr. Kroll, who for three seasons has been associate or acting head of the chamber music department at the Center, is teaching violin and chamber music at the Peabody Institute, Baltimore and the Mannes School of Music in New York City, where he lives. He is also head of the Kroll Quartet, which will start this fall its eighth season of country-wide tours. The quartet are four of the nine musicians who form the Musicians Guild, giving four concerts each year in Town Hall, New York.

While living at South Mountain, Mr. Kroll was violinist with the Elshuco Trio and the South Mountain Quartet. He played first violin in 1935 in the Coolidge Quartet, until the quartet bearing his name was formed in 1944.

Hugh Ross, who will conduct the "Missa Brevis" this evening, has trained the choruses for concert and opera since the school opened. He has conducted many of the principal choral works in the Festival concerts. Conductor of the Schola Cantorum in New York, in the past season he has conducted choruses in Philadelphia, Bethlehem, Pittsburgh, and other major cities. He also conducted the first performance in America of Benjamin Britten's symphony, the first performance in America for 35 years of the Berlioz "Te Deum," with Sir Thomas Beecham, British conductor, and a performance with Metropolis, New York Philharmonic conductor. He is head of the choral and choral conducting department at Tanglewood.

Copland
Vitebsk (study on a Jewish theme) for violin, violoncello and piano.
Violin, Teruko Akagi; violoncello, Moshe Amitay; piano, Joyce Paull.

Debussy
Quartet in G minor.
Violins, Bernard Muller, Joanne Dempsey; viola, Raymond Montoni; violoncello, Robert Sayre

Three of the players are students from foreign countries: Mr. Amitay from Israel; Miss Akagi, Japan; Mr. Muller, Switzerland.

Composers' Forum

At the composers' forum tomorrow evening the program, whose music was written by students of composition at Tanglewood and performed by their friends at the school, the program will be:

Norman Grossman
Movement for String Trio.
F. James Brown
Three Fantasies for voice and piano to poems of E. E. Cummings.
Robert Parris
Three Love Lyrics.
Charles M. Schwartz
Three songs for soprano. . . . Movement for woodwind quintet.
Bryan Dority
Chamber cantata, Romeo and Juliet.

Picnic parties are welcome on the Tanglewood lawn. The cafeteria is open to the public before and after concerts and during intermission. Tickets for the concerts in the shed, starting Thursday night, when Charles Munch will conduct the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra, are on sale at the box office, England Brothers, Pittsfield, and the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge.

TANGLEWOOD SEASON STARTS TOMORROW

Charles Munch and Boston Symphony Prepare for Initial Concerts

Tanglewood, Lenox, June 29 — The first eventful week of the 1951 Tanglewood season opens Sunday as the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center opens, and as Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrive to prepare for their initial concerts, Saturday and Sunday, July 7 and 8, of music by Johann Sebastian Bach.

Leonard Bernstein, who this year assumes Serge Koussevitzky's duties in the music school, and Aaron Copland, composition instructor and assistant director, will speak at the school's opening exercises, as will Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, rector of Trinity Church in Boston and trustee of the orchestra. Dr. Lewis E. Perry, chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, will preside.

Nearly complete registration figures show almost 400 students enrolled for the six-week session. They will begin their work Monday in each of the five departments. The first of more than 30 musical events performed by the students will take place on Friday evening, July 6, with a concert by the student symphony orchestra, performing in the music shed. The popular Sunday morning student chamber music recitals, and the weekly composers' forums will also begin next week. These concerts, and the others will be attended by Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, and by other students. Last year the total attendance at such student events exceeded 50,000.

As the music school gets under way, the Boston Symphony Orchestra arrives at its summer home too. Charles Munch arrives in Boston Sunday from France, having cancelled his European engagements in order to conduct at the Berkshire Festival concerts. His rehearsals for the first series of week end concerts of music by Bach, Haydn, and Mozart will begin this week. Tickets for these concerts, and for concerts in the music shed, are still available at the ticket office, Tanglewood, Lenox.

Piatigorsky Plays Haydn

LENOX, Mass., July 15.—Gregor Piatigorsky raised the record audience at Tanglewood this afternoon to a pitch of excitement they hadn't reached in any other part of the two-concert Haydn series played today and last night. Playing with a command of the instrument and a comprehension of the piece quite beyond words, he called forth an ovation which was richly deserved, and which up to this point had not been reached during the first two weeks of this season.

Charles Munch directed the two programs, using an orchestra of thirty to thirty-five men from the Boston Symphony. This was the second of three week ends being played in the theater concert hall. The first was all Bach; next week is Mozart, and this week was all Haydn. The pattern of each concert was to begin and end with a symphony and insert works for a solo instrument in the middle.

Last night Seymour Lipkin played the D major piano concerto with gratifying maturity and insight, giving the first movement an especial brilliance. This was followed by the Sinfonie Concertante, in which the soloists were Richard Burgin, violin; Samuel Mayes, cello; Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. Concert master Burgin was conspicuously happy in his opportunities this delightful work afforded him, particularly the recitatives, where he and Munch gave the dialogues graceful and effective phrasing.

Favored by ideal weather, the attendance records exceeded those of last year with figures of 3,800 at each of this week's concerts. The audience, using the broad adjacent lawns, more than doubled the number inside the hall. It seemed, too, that Haydn offered Munch more favorable material for the special circumstances which obtain in the theater concert hall. His men played with more relaxed confidence and gave him greater warmth of tone than in the Bach series. He also achieved better balance. J. P.

Cellist Steals Performance At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 16 —The works of Joseph Haydn, represented by four symphonies, a sinfonie concertante for winds and strings, the D major Piano Concerto and a superb interpretation of the violoncello Concerto in D major, were offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end.

The all-Haydn programs followed last week's Bach concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall. Next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon the orchestra will devote itself to music by Mozart, in the third week-end of "Little" concerts opening the 11th year of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

Gregor Piatigorsky, a rollicking, exuberant giant who came onstage swinging his cello as if it were a violin, was soloist yesterday. He drew an unprecedented burst of applause from the audience after the sustained solo passage by the cello in the exposition of the concerto, and from there on, set his own pace for Charles Munch and the orchestra to follow.

Piano soloist for Saturday night's concert was Seymour Lipkin, 24-year-old New Yorker who is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. His playing of the three-part concerto was brilliant, particularly movingly in the tender, melodic adagio movement.

Of the four symphonies offered, No. 88, No. 104 ("London") No. 103 ("The Drum Roll,") and No. 101 ("The Clock,") the 88th was perhaps the warmest, although the tempi of the opening two movements seemed a trifle too restrained by comparison with the full, robust treatment of its minuet and final.

Visitors to Tanglewood will often find that some of the most stimulating music comes not from the professional perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but from the numberless student groups whose recitals are open to supporting members, "Friends," of the Music Center. Yesterday morning, young musicians of the orchestral department gave a program of chamber music in the open-sided Chamber Music Hall. Opera Department students list a program for tomorrow night, the student orchestra gives a Shed concert Friday, while another chamber music recital will again be given Sunday morning.

Dr. Munch Opens Music Festival

LENOX—In his first appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Summer Music Festival at Tanglewood, Dr. Charles Munch was greeted last night by a throng of 3600, largest opening night audience on record. A memorial tribute, Dr. Munch conducted one of the masterpieces most loved by his predecessor, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky.

The final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew," performed by the orchestra and festival chorus, was among the selections of the all-Bach program. It was a favorite of Dr. Koussevitsky, who for 25 years conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and who founded Tanglewood and developed it as a national music center.

A capacity audience of 1200 filled every seat in the theater concert hall. Other music lovers overflowed into the spacious lawns surrounding the auditorium. Dr. Munch had arrived here only a week ago following a tour of Europe. The second in a series of Bach concerts will be held at 3 p. m.

Danube Unruffled At Koussevitzky Death

THE PASSING of Serge Koussevitzky, long time conductor of the Boston Symphony, drew but cursory mention in the Vienna press. The city's oldest inhabitants couldn't recall a Vienna performance by Koussevitzky, and his sympathy for contemporary creation is something antipathetic to this area in any case.

Whatever the elegance of musicianship provided by the Vienna Philharmonic for opera performances, sortorial graces are nonexistent. Nobdy wears evening dress but the conductor. Come to think of it, there's no indication in Vienna shop windows (which are otherwise impressively stocked) that such a thing exists.

Probably the early starting time (7 p. m.) is a closely related factor. It leaves little time for more than a quick wash after the day's work.

Major Berkshire Season Opening—

Munch to Begin Shed Series At Tanglewood on Thursday

The fourteenth season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed opens Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its director.

For the next three weeks the festival will continue with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5; and on Thursday, Aug. 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

Mr. Munch's programs for this week are varied and include works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony will complete the opening concert.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofiev's Sixth Symphony. It will conclude with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto for which the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, will be soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal"; Aaron Copland's "The Quiet City"; Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony; and César Franck's Symphony in D minor.

One of the high lights of the more than 30 musical events performed during the 1951 season will be Friday's program (July 27), which will present the work of all departments of the Center in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky.

Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118; a chamber music group performing Schubert's "Trout" Quintet; a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion; a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame"; and performances of Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms.

The complete performance of "Pique Dame" by the Tanglewood opera department under the direction of Boris Goldovsky will take place next week, July 30 and July 31. The other opera production will be Richard Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" on Aug. 6 and 7. Attendance at these productions is by invitation to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Haydn Concerts At Tanglewood

Special to The Hartford Times

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. —Dr. Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will present [illegible] second program in the Theater Concert Hall series Saturday at 8:15 p. m. and Sunday at 3 p. m.

Both concerts will be devoted solely to the music of Franz Josef Haydn, the great 18th Century master, and this will be the first time that this composer has been represented in what used to be solely the Bach-Mozart series.

Saturday's program will include Seymour Lipkin as piano soloist in the Concerto in D Major for piano and orchestra, the Symphonie Concertante for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon, and two symphonies, No. 88 and No. 104.

Sunday, Dr. Munch and the orchestra will perform the Violoncello Concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and three more symphonies, No. 101 ("The Clock"), No. 103 ("The Drum Roll"), and No. 92 ("Oxford").

Next weekend, the final concert of the series will be devoted to Mozart. As before, general admission tickets to the grounds may be obtained at the gate.

Record Tanglewood Crowd In Koussevitzky Tribute

Record audiences attended the opening concerts of Tanglewood's "Little series" over the week-end when Charles Munch, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted all [illegible]rams Saturday night and yesterday afternoon.

About 3,600 attended the opening concert Saturday night and another 2,800 heard the Sunday afternoon program. The number was 1,000 more than attended the opening week-end concerts last year, but, of course, was well below the usual attendance at major festival concerts in the music shed. Most of the audience was comfortably seated on the lawn outside the theater-concert hall.

Tribute to Koussevitzky

Mr. Munch was well received as successor to the late Serge Koussevitzky, founder and former conductor of the Berkshire Music festival.

Saturday night's program included the Brandenburg concertos No. 2, 3, 4 and 6; the concerto for three pianos with [illegible]ing Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera as soloists; and the final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew," sung by the festival chorus conducted by Dr. Hugh Ross. This selection was sung in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky and at its finish the audience, at the request of Mr. Munch, did not applaud, but rose for a moment of silence in tribute to the late Tanglewood conductor.

Yesterday afternoon's program was made up of other works of Bach, including "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus," a secular cantata, sung by the festival chorus and four soloists, Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass; the concerto for three pianos and strings, with Pianists Fine, Berkowitz and Zighera as soloists; and the Magnificat by the chorus and soloists.

Haydn Next Week-End

Next week-end's concerts, Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, will be devoted to the music of Haydn. Mr. Munch will conduct the symphony in G major, the Symphonie Concertante for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon, the "London" symphony, and the piano concerto in D major. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the solo in the violin-cello concerto for Sunday's program, which will include the "Drum Roll," "Clock" and "Oxford" symphonies.

Last evening a memorial concert in honor of the late Dr. Koussevitzky was given by teachers of the Berkshire Music Center school at the Church-on-the-Hill, Congregational, in Lenox.

A resident of Lenox, Dr. Koussevitzky had long been associated with the church. He was married there in 1947 to his second wife by Rev. Herbert Owen, pastor. Last night's concert was held exactly one month after funeral services for Dr. Koussevitzky were held there.

8800 Hear All-Mozart Concerts With Kroll, Tanglewood Chorus

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—Charles Munch closed yesterday afternoon's concert in the theatre concert hall with the "Prague" symphony of Mozart and thereby brought to completion the first half of his Tanglewood debut season. An audience of 3500, undoubtedly held down by the uncertainty of the weather, gave him full and cordial acclaim. On Saturday evening more than 5300 people came for the first of the two Mozart programs which precede the opening of the grand series in the large Shed this Thursday. Even with the weather diminishing the crowds at the final concert the over-all figures came within 90% of last year's record attendance.

There is probably no greater test for a musician than a Mozart program. Music of other composers at times can make an impact of a sort when played even in a mediocre way. But Mozart when uninspired is limp and shapeless; given a probing and imagination he acquires stature and life that becomes unmatched and incomparable.

Kroll Superlative

As an example of what Mozart in expert hands can become, witness William Kroll's performance yesterday afternoon of the A major violin concerto. He gave it elegance of style and broad magnificence, even to the point of excessive deliberation, and made it a truly great performance. It had rich tonal beauty and exhibited poise and maturity and refinement.

Munch, too, seemed to be happier with Mozart than he had been with the preceding week ends of Bach and Haydn. The divertimento for strings and two horns acquired a greater variety of expression than had been evident in any previous offerings of the series. The delicacy of the variations was a lovely moment for the violins and the solos of concert-master Richard Burgin were played with consummate inflections.

Saturday night Munch played the "Haffner" and the last E flat symphonies. Subtle details made their appearance in certain telling spots to substantially embellish the whole performance. Between the symphonies came the F major "Missa Brevis" and the adagio and fugue for strings. In the latter there was a lack of determination because sufficient intensity was not demanded of the musicians. The voices were kept clear and the lines distinct but it seems that this fugue, of all music, requires all the concentrated power that instruments can generate.

Four Vocal Soloists

Hugh Ross took over the baton for the Mass and conducted with the help of a chorus of 50 mixed voices. Soloists were soprano Gladys Spector, contralto Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. All but Miss Spector had sung many times at Tanglewood. She immediately proved the validity of her right to take her place in such a distinguished quartet. She showed the command of a long easily-sustained vocal line with ample power. The chorus was composed of superior material and responded to Mr. Ross' requests with lovely sound and distinct contrasts.

Simultaneous with yesterday's concert came the completion of the Esplanade concerts on the Charles River so that the larger complement of the Boston orchestra will now immediately join their colleagues at Tanglewood for rehearsals by the entire symphony for the concerts in the Shed.

Plouffe

HOOT MON: Sir Shane Leslie, first cousin of Winston Churchill, in kilts of the Leslie clan, of which he is head for the branch in Ulster, Ireland, meets Hugh Ross, part English and part Scot, director of the choral conducting class at Tanglewood, after yesterday's concert. In the U.S. to study American forestry, he came down from Bennington, Vt., where he is visiting a cousin, Travers Jerome, to hear Charles Munch conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

French Ambassador Bonnet To Attend Festival Thursday

TANGLEWOOD—Henri Bonnet, French ambassador to the United States and Madame Bonnet, will attend the opening concert in the Music Shed at the Berkshire Festival Thursday evening.

Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's conductor, Charles Munch, the Bonnets will arrive in Pittsfield by train early Thursday morning from Detroit, Mich., where he is speaking this week in connection with the 250th anniversary of the founding of the city by the Frenchman, Antoine Cadillac.

Move to Shed Considered

Although the attendance at the three week-end Festival concerts in the theatre concert hall was about 600 below last year's figure, the Tanglewood management has been experimenting with the possibility of taking the "smaller" series next year over to the large Music Shed.

The theatre concert hall seats 1200 persons. When 4100 are willing to sit or lake outdoors as they did Saturday night, the authorities think some provision should be made for such numbers in the case of unfavorable weather.

The attendance yesterday afternoon was kept down to 3550 by threatening weather, Tanglewood officials believe. As part of the experiment in the Shed, temporary small shells and sounding boards have been erected on the main stage. The management has also set up platforms at various spots under the huge roof, testing acoustics and seating possibilities. No decision has yet been reached.

The total attendance for this year's three week-end concerts was 22,900.

Conductor Munch and the full Boston Symphony Orchestra continued rehearsals today for the Series A concerts which will open the major portion of the Festival starting Thursday night. The program will include Mozart's "Funeral Music" in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the Berkshire Music Center and conductor of the BSO for 25 years before his retirement in 1949. Also on the program will be Schulman's fourth symphony and Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony."

Song Recital Tomorrow

Two programs will be given for Friends of the Berkshire Music Center tomorrow. At 4.30, in the chamber music hall, the first song recital will be held under the direction of Ralph Berkowitz and Paul Ulanowsky.

Members of the opera department will sing groups of songs by Debussy, Brahms, Schubert, Satie, Faure and Falla, with accompaniment by Edith Gross and Joseph Rezits, pianists. The singers will be Patricia Poltras, mezzo-soprano; Marguerite Stagliano, soprano, Lawrence Avery, tenor and Eunice Alberts, contralto. Maxine Johnson will be the violist in Brahms' two songs for alto and viola.

The opera department, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, will present tomorrow evening at 8.15 Acts 1 and 4 from Puccini's "La Boheme" and Acts 1 and 2 from Verdi's "Falstaff."

Notes and Footnotes

QUITE a few people including ourselves have been known to cry out that driving to Tanglewood during the season is just too much. Well, after yesterday we weep no more. We talked with a couple who came from Labrador expressly to hear the music. That is nearly 1000 miles, and what do you think? They rode a motorcycle!

They're staying with Miss Annabelle Terrell in Chatham, N.Y., and we had a long talk with James Borcoman who called himself the pilot. "Navigator" was Miss Therese Jomphe, and both live on the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, a hop-skip from the town of Seven Islands on the edge of the newly discovered Labrador ore beds which would feed the proposed steel mill at New London.

Both travelers are employed by the Quebec North Shore Paper Company, a subsidiary of Colonel McCormick's Chicago Tribune. Mr. Borcoman has met the colonel and says he's okay, despite his fiercely anti-British policies. The fact that Mr. B's cycle is English-made does not matter, especially as the colonel doesn't know about it."

The trip took two weeks, and as you read this, the couple will be chugging back north. They were a shade disappointed at missing the Shed concerts, as information on Tanglewood dates is not very explicit in Labrador. However, they heard four concerts in the theatre music hall and liked them all.

Coolidge Concerts Open

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The first of the three Wednesday evening concerts which Mrs. Coolidge and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress are sponsoring at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood proved to be an exciting performance. The New Music String Quartet played Hindemith's quartet in F minor, Opus 10, the Verdi quartet and Beethoven's Opus 59, No. 3. The members of the quartet are Broadus Erle and Matthew Raimondi, violins, Walter Trampler, viola, and Claus Adam, cello.

Hindemith wrote his first quartet at least 20 years before he was a member of the Berkshire Music Center faculty and at a period when he had not yet gone atonal. It was already intricate and involved writing, but beneath the fingers of last night's artists it became exceptionally lucid and transparent. By means of the happy device of dynamic restraint, they allowed each voice to be heard alongside the others with the result that they achieved a rare integration. All the filaments were knit into one live strand, warm and incandescent, clearly articulated, on their four matching Guadagninis.

Rich in Ideas

Hindemith was just bursting with musical ideas at that moment and he pours a wealth of themes into this quartet, all of them interesting, not always without apparent background sources, but all with a flow and urgency which the members of last night's quartet set forth with glowing tone and intensification. Many musicians are not even aware that Verdi ever ventured into chamber music. His sole essay was written in the period just following "Aida" and is of more historical interest than otherwise. It was inevitable that a couple of "arias" should appear during the course of the pages. They were "sung" spaciously and with lovely tone. The other sections of the four movements are enjoyable but make no one wonder why the quartet has not remained in the active literature of chamber music.

It was a pity that the members of the quartet could not recognize that their very virtuosity, was luring them, as surely as Lorelei, onto the rocks in the Beethoven quartet. True, they avoided—indeed, were never near—shipwreck, but the speed of the final fugue robbed it of all musical meaning and content. They muffed completely the majestic breadth which Beethoven made possible to expose with any reasonable co-operation.

A Stunt

It was a stunt, to be sure, which few quartets could realize, but one which parallels the boast of the growing youngster who flexes his arm and with innocent pride asks "see my muscle?" One of the finest pages in chamber music was spoiled. As a matter of fact, the first movement, too, would have gained in depth at a slower pace. One could not fail to marvel at the maintenance of clarity in some of the unhandy and swift passages which Beethoven writes in this section, but with a less rigid drive, subtleties and nuances appear which make this one of the pinnacles of all chamber music. If only the impression made in the Hindemith could have prevailed all the evening!

The next concert in this Coolidge series will be played Wednesday evening when the Berkshire Trio, Georges Laurent, flute, Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, and Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichord, will play a program of early music for their special groups of instruments.

Concert Reviews And Summer Notes On Active Musicians Here And There

There is no rest for the weary reporter as musical events in this busy cosmopolitan city go on apace despite the supposed close of the season and annoying heat, rain, wind and humidity—terrifying but undaunting to music critics still on the job, and to music lovers (bless their hearts) who, faithful to the art and their friends, turn out in goodly numbers for most of the events. All hail to New Yorkers who have given their support to sincere musicians and have helped to encourage them on to success and fame!

Community Church Concert

Three concert artists who so magnanimously gave their services to The Community Church of New York, 40 E. 35th St., to help swell the funds of its Interracial-Interfaith Camp Scholarship on Friday evening, July 29, deserve bravos for a night of beautiful music. In order of appearance, they were, Muriel Landers, soprano, a diseuse of dramatic and comedy roles on radio, TV and concert, whose appealing voice entranced the audience in songs by Mozart, Gretchanioff, Bizet and Debussy, and reached a dramatic apex in the Air de Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue." Margaret Bonds, now widening her sphere as a concert pianist, gave a polished performance of Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor. For sheer animation, for power and pace, her reading offered ample delight. To further exhibit her sound musicianship, Miss Bonds played two of her own compositions based on Negro spirituals, "Peter Go Ring Dem Bells," and "Wade in De Water," which won a volume of applause. In the latter, Miss Bonds uses a recurrent basso ostinato figure against the theme, and a compositional form traditional in structure but inventive enough to make the work refreshing to hear, and her performance was particularly brilliant and skillful.

It was a rare treat to hear Lawrence Davidson, bass-baritone, now in his fourth year with the Metropolitan Opera Association, and whose vocal sweep covers Wagnerian roles, Leporello in "Don Giovanni," Bartolo in "Barber of Seville," and other roles, to several smash hits in musical comedy. Mr. Davidson scaled his concert offerings to easily digestible songs by Gretchanioff, Griffes and a delightful soliloquy from Rodgers' "Carousel". But when he reached Mozart's "Madamina," Leporetto's aria from "Don Giovanni," the sumptuous quailty of his voice and the grand scope of his musicianship was apparent. Here was an artist whose years of serious training was reflected in his spirit, great ardor and assurance. His musical line was always clean and his command of vocal colors extensive, from forte high notes to the most delicate pianissimi. Truly a great, communicative artist, and the audience responded with full applause and bravos. The concert closed with Miss Landers and Mr. Davidson singing the lovely "Bess You Is My Woman" from "Porgy and Bess," and each artist of the evening received complimentary requests for encores.

Brooks Alexander

Continuing his concert work after several years with the Fisk Jubilee Singers, Brooks Alexander, young baritone, gave a recital at Carl Fischer Concert Hall, Sunday evening, July 1, before a capacity audience, and exhibited a vocal talent which shows signs of great promise once he settles down to intensive training. Vocal production—movement on the scale, pure intonation, languages and interpretation—are not yet fluent, but his musical sensitivity served him well in Handel's "Hear Me, Ye Winds and Waves" and Massenet's "Vision Funitive." Matthew Kennedy assisted skillfully at the piano.

Sacred Concert

A unique and pleasurable sacred concert was given at Harlem Boys Club Sunday afternoon, by Henrietta Lovelace, soprano, and William Kyles' Gospel Singers, termed unique because sacred concerts are usually performed by choral singers. Miss Lovelace was in excellent voice and gave a soulful performance of such spirituals as "Let Us Break Bread Together," "I Want Jesus to Walk with Me," and others. Her high tones were thrilling and her musical training served to keep middle tones light when they were unmanageable. The Gospel Singers, a group of three men and a woman, were exceptionally good, preserving a solemn feeling in their songs, yet filled with religious emotion and rhythm, expressive of gospel songs. Two of them were especially impressive, "I Call on Jesus to Carry Me Through," and "I'm Happy in the Service of the Lord." The woman's voice blended well with the men, and Mr. Kyles is an excellent soloist in his own right. The accompanist for the singers was harmonious and inventive in his work, and Miss Lovelace's accompanist was also quite a pianist.

Music Notes—Julia Parry, whose work in composition is steadily gaining recognition, is on a scholarship to Tanglewood, and her woodwind trio was performed at the Composer's Forum last Sunday evening. She is one of eight hand-picked students under the twelve-tone composer, Luigi Dallapiccola, teaching at the Berkshire Music Center this season. His opera "The Prisoner" was heard at Juilliard last season. (More news next issue.)

A Tribute to the Genius Of Serge Koussevitzky.

By Fredric Vonn.

Serge Koussevitzky, a conductor of unique talents, whose passing is such a very great loss, is no longer present to further the cause of American music. In addition to his many outstanding qualities, he was also the greatest champion of the American composers, a group to which the writer belongs.

So many composers owe a very great debt of gratitude to this extraordinary musician, noted for his vision and progressive point of view.

The question has been raised as to the future of the famous Berkshire Music Center, now that it lacks the personal enthusiasm of its dynamic founder, Serge Koussevitzky.

It is heartening to learn, however, that it will continue this year, at least, under the able administration of Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland. Although the center is not to be definitely discontinued, its maintenance is known to be very costly to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In view of that state of affairs, might it not be fitting to have the composers, who have benefited so much by Koussevitzky's efforts, come, in some way, to the aid of this most valuable institution?

Summer Symphonic Events

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Three conductors will share the direction of this week's concerts at the Lewisohn Stadium, where the season enters its second half on Thursday. Vladimir Golschmann completes his Stadium assignment with the concerts of tomorrow, Tuesday and Wednesday night, in which Nathan Milstein, violinist; Aldo Parisot, cellist, and Stell Andersen, pianist, will be the respective guest soloists. Michael Rosenker, who is the Philharmonic-Symphony's assistant concertmaster in the regular season and concertmaster of this summer's Stadium Symphony Orchestra, will play the violin solo in Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" on Wednesday.

On Thursday night, with Alexander Smallens, Jeanette MacDonald will make her first New York appearance with orchestra. She gave her first recital here last October. Alfredo Antonini will conduct the Stadium's annual Italian opera program on Saturday night, with Herva Nelli, soprano; Claramae Turner, contralto; Richard Tucker, tenor, and the Collegiate Chorale as the assisting singers. Both Mr. Tucker and Mr. Parisot will make their Stadium debuts.

Charles Munch will conduct a chamber orchestra of Boston Symphony musicians in a Haydn program this afternoon in the Theater-Concert Hall, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The concerts of next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, July 21 and 22, wil be devoted to Mozart. The programs announced are:

Today, 3: Haydn: Symphony No. 103 (Drum Roll), Cello Concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky), Symphonies Nos. 101 (Clock) and 92 (Oxford).

Saturday, 8:15: Mozart: Symphony No. 35 (Haffner) Missa Brevis, K. 192 (Hugh Ross conducting); Eine kleine Nachtmusik; Adagio and Fugue for Strings; Symphony No. 39, in E flat.

Next Sunday, 3: Mozart: Divertimento for strings and Horns, K. 287; Violin Concerto in A major (William Kroll); Symphony No. 38 (Prague).

The Chautauqua Symphony Orchestra began its summer series under Franco Autori's conductorship in the amphitheater at Chautauqua, N. Y., last night. This series will be held on Tuesday, Wednesday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons through Aug. 22; the Wednesday programs will be of a popular character. Howard Hanson's second "Romantic") Symphony will be played Tuesday night and Norman Dello Joio's Variations, Chaconne and Finale this afternoon. Today's program also includes Ernest Bloch's "Scherzo Fantastique," with Ida Krehm as the piano soloist. Wednesday's program will be devoted to Gershwin's music. The Chautauqua Opera Company will give Verdi's "Aida" as its second production of the season next Friday night and the following Monday, July 23.

The University of Miami Symphony Orchestra, conducted by John Bitter, begins a Sunday series of eight concerts in the Miami Beach (Fla.) Municipal Auditorium tonight.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

Tribune

LENOX, Mass., July 22.—Gray skies and a mild threat of rain undoubtedly kept attendance down this afternoon at the final concert in the theater-concert hall at Tanglewood, of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series. For the final duo of programs devoted entirely to Mozart there were 5,300 persons last night and, but for the weather, there was every indication that today's concert would take the gross attendance figures above those of last year. This afternoon's 3,500 left the series a bare 600 behind the record established last year.

Charles Munch, directing an ensemble of thirty-five men, seemed to be especially in the vein with Mozart and found more fertile ground in these programs than he had evinced in the preceding ones. Last night his "Haffner" and the big E Flat symphonies were substantial and gratifying, and this afternoon in the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns he achieved a delicacy and subtlety which gave his Mozart individual character and effectiveness.

William Kroll, in the A major violin concerto, played with consummate refinement and mature poise. The elegance of his style and the breadth of his conception, possibly at times even too spacious, won him a tremendous ovation. He drew a tone of round, pure sonority and maintained the softest artistry in all three movements. His phrasing was the quintessence of musical expression.

Mr. Munch put color in the "Prague" symphony which closed the program this afternoon and developed a significance which had not always been apparent in the programs devoted to the other composers. There were dramatic contrasts, and his tempi, in the stately introduction and then in the following allegro, gave ample opportunity to the Boston Symphony players to show the caliber of their famous string section. This was noticeable also in the lovely variations of the divertimento, in which Richard Burgin again distinguished himself in the several occasions Mozart makes for the concertmaster.

Last night Mr. Munch vacated the podium to allow Hugh Ross to conduct the F Major missa brevis with fifty mixed voices from the students of the Berkshire Music Center, with Gladys Spector as soprano soloist, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Peasse, bass. Miss Spector was the only one of the solo quartet new to Tanglewood and in her first short phrase displayed a beautiful long-sustained vocal line which matched the solos of her colleagues in every way. Mr. Ross had n excellent personnel in his chorus and he was able to effect nuances and dynamic changes with acute musical judgment.

This was the first phase of Mr. Munch's Tanglewood debut and he met it with increasing audience satisfaction. Had the weather been more favorable this afternoon it is certain that this final program would have attracted an audience at least equal to that of last night. The Tanglewood authorities have been toying with the idea and making experiments all week to see if the so-called "smaller" concerts, originally established during the war years as an emergency expedient, cannot be moved over to the big shed next year. It was never expected that these concerts would draw as they have and would become so popular. Thousands are evidently happy to spread themselves on the lawn and listen with the relaxation and such comfort as the out-of-doors permits. The management, however, lucky up to now with the weather, must shudder to think of the loss of revenue if inclement weather should preclude an outside audience.

With this final theater-concert hall program the remainder of the Boston Symphony, now that the esplanade concerts on the Charles River are over, will arrive tomorrow to join the ensemble already here for rehearsals for the first concert Thursday night of the final three weeks in the great shed.

Irta: LUKACS ERNO.

Legutóbbi new-englandi cikkemben, — amennyire szerény képességem lehetővé tette megpróbáltam a berkshirei hegyek csodálatos szépségét leirni. — A napokban ennek a gyönyörü hegyláncolatnak a legmagasabb plátóján — Tanglewoodban — voltam. — Körülményesen jutottam oda el, — azonban a festői utak és az elragadó panoráma elfeledtette velem a fáradságos utazást.

Tanglewood — nekünk amerikaiaknak azt jelenti, ami az európai zenerajongónak Salzburg. — Salzburgot varázsos zenei ünnepeivel Max Reinhardt tette világszerte ismertté. — Tanglellwoodot a lánglelkü Serge Koussevitzky, a világhirü karmester teremtette meg. Az Ő elgondolása volt, hogy a szimfonikus muzsikának nyári diszleteként a természet pompáját alkalmazza, — távol a koncert termektől és azoknak formalitásától.

A tanglewoodi music center 3000 lábnyi magasságban fekszik. Fenséges és festői látvány a koncertterületről elterülő kép: csodás, hatalmas tó, hegyekkel koszoruzva.

A program ezuttal kizárólagosan Bach müvekből állott. Az első szám, az egyik legkiválóbb cantata, a "Der zufriedengestellte Aeolus" volt, Hugh Ross vezénylésével. Másodiknak a D moll zongoraverseny, fiatal tehetségek bemutatkozásával (Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, Ralplh Berkowitz) — végtelenül gyönyörködtetett. Befejező számként St. Lukács evangeliumából a D dur "Magnificat" glóriás kórusa adott igazán felejthetetlen élményt.

A müsor két utolsó számát a hires francia karmester Charles Munch vezényelte, a ki ugylátszik méltó utóda nagyszerü elődének Serge Koussevitzkynek. — Nem vagyok zenekritikus és arról a mit hallottam nem is lehet kritikát irni, csak lebörulni lehet előtte és áldani a Gondviselőt, hogy ezt a ritka élményt megengedte énnem.

Mozart Music in the Berkshires —

Preliminary Concert Series Concluded at Tanglewood

By Paul Cinciana

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

For the final pair of [illegible] concerts devoted to [illegible] of Wolfgang Amadeus [illegible], Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played a widely representative group of compositions by the eighteenth-century master in the Theater-Concert Hall here at Tanglewood.

From the symphonic literature were chosen the early "Haffner" Symphony and the great E-flat at his final mature period—both played on Saturday evening—and the popular "Prague" Symphony played on Sunday afternoon. From Mozart's sacred literature the Tanglewood Chorus under the direction of Hugh Ross performed the Missa Brevis in F major, composed for liturgical use as were his other short masses.

Two chamber works of great interest were included—the Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra on Saturday night and the Divertimento in B-flat major for Strings and Two Horns on Sunday afternoon. The Violin Concerto in A major was also performed on Sunday.

As the strains of the "Haffner" Symphony opened the concert Saturday evening, the listeners fell into that attentive silence which is one of the more impressive features of a great outdoor audience at Tanglewood.

Perhaps the most striking aspect of Mr. Munch's approach to Mozartian interpretation is his ability to allow the music to speak in its own way to the listener. In the Saturday evening symphonies, especially in the E-flat, there was no tenseness, undue urgency, or exaggerated pressure—even when the pace was alive and racy in the last movement of the "Haffner" or beautifully contemplative as in the second movement of the E-flat. The E-flat Symphony came from that mature period in Mozart's life which produced also the incomparable G minor and towering "Jupiter" symphonies.

Mr. Ross, his chorus, and a quartet of soloists—Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass—interpreted the several compact portions of the Missa Brevis with vigor and clarity. The work is closely knit, and there are no instrumental preludes except for the opening "Kyrie" and the final "Agnus Dei."

The voices sing through the long text—soloists and chorus alternating without break — with almost no repetitions. The four familiar notes of the "Credo" ring throughout the final movements and indeed become a main melodic fragment—the same four notes which base the main theme in the final movement of the "Jupiter" Symphony.

All four soloists sang with clarity of tone and beauty of expression. The most inspired interpretation by singers and strings alike came in the final "Agnus Dei."

In the Fugue arranged for strings, which Mozart originally wrote for two keyboards, may be heard the epitome of Mozart's contrapuntal skill derived directly from Johann Sebastian Bach. Years later Mozart added an Adagio, equal in musical substance, to precede the passages of ponderous polyphony in the Fugue. Mr. Munch and the strings gave the work a reading of great dignity and clarity. Each strand of the interlaced counterpoint was given careful attention and made to stand out with its own individuality.

Mozart's Divertimenti were composed for garden parties and drawing-room gatherings of his patrons. The one for strings and horns which opened the Sunday afternon concert was written for a winter party. Those intended for a garden party usually included marches for coming in and withdrawing.

The French horns here do not have prominent solo significance but are used to blend and contrast with the string texture. It is the first violin section which predominates—this was often played by Mozart himself—and in several places its passages assume cadenza proportions.

Mr. Munch and his musicians interpreted the work with an easy abandon, phrasing passages with impeccable taste. The deeply felt Adagio of the second movement with muted strings called forth sensitive artistry, especially from the solo violin of Mr. Burgin. Controlled lyricism throughout the entire movement provided a rare experience of Mozartian refinement.

The soloist of the afternoon was William Kroll, first violinist of the Coolidge String Quartet in the Library of Congress and for the past three summers on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

His clean and musicianly performance of the A major Concerto in three movements won an ovation. He played with a purity of tone and delicacy of bravura passages. His cadenzas—especially at the end of the first movement—were tossed off with the studied abandon of the virtuoso.

Mr. Munch's interpretation of the closing three-movement "Prague" Symphony finished the chamber series on the highest plane. Each of the movements created its atmosphere of superlative quality. Grace, light-heartedness, and beauty were all present in excellent taste. At the close of the lightning Presto Mr. Munch and the musicians acknowledged prolonged applause.

Haydn Program Pleases Audience At Tanglewood

That Charles Munch is a worthy conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra was indeed evident at last Saturday's concert of Haydn music in the theatre of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

The opening symphony in G major, scored for small orchestra, brought a sense of relaxation with the feeling that here was Haydn undiluted and unembellished by personalities foreign to his singular artistry. The whole symphony, with its various changes of moods, tone-color and modulations, was a perfection not often attained by performers and composer. The Trio, with its suggestion of bagpipes, brings again to mind the fact that this ancient instrument was not confined to the countries of Scotland and Ireland.

An able rendition of the piano concerto in D minor was given by a young and serious pianist, Seymour Lipkin, who is a faculty member of the Berkshire Music Center. One wished, at times, that the accompaniment and piano were more thoughtfully attuned, but such is the nature of concerto, it was delightful to follow to its typically lightsome finish.

A concertante in B-flat major, written and conducted in London in 1792 by Haydn, to bring forward certain talents of Salomon's orchestra, was interesting in the variety of color produced by the four instrumental soloists. The usually velvety tone of the violinist, Richard Burgin, was unpleasantly thin in the high register, and at times sounded like a viola in the low and middle registers. This was met by the characteristically thin tone of the French bassoon played by Raymond Allard. The warmth and musicianship of the cellist Samuel Mayes was more than matched by the outstanding quality and musical phrasing of the young and relatively new oboist, Raiph Gomberg. The orchestral accompaniment was singularly good, and the quartet, on the whole, significantly displayed the musical ideas of the composer.

The final symphony in D-major, the twelfth composed in England by Haydn, full of contrasts and unexpected forms, with again a suggestion of bagpipes in the finale, seemed at times a tired rehearsal, with the conductor audibly silencing the orchestra several times to achieve that wealth of color we expect and applaud in all of Haydn's music.

A capacity audience of 3800 were unrestrained in their applause of the conductor Charles Munch and the orchestra, and left with the high spirits usually induced by an evening of Haydn's music.—By Martha deB. Beaver.

Weekend of Mozart On Tanglewood Bill

Eight works by Mozart will be played by Charles Munch and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Saturday evening the Missa Brevis (K-192) will be given with soloists Gladys Spector, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass. Hugh Ross will conduct.

Also on this program will be the Haffner Symphony, No. 35; Symphony in E Flat, No. 39, Adagio and Fugue for Strings (K-546); and "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik."

Sunday afternoon's program includes the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns (K.287); the Violin Concerto in A Major, with William Kroll as soloist; and the Prague Symphony, No. 38.

These programs will conclude the chamber-orchestra concerts in the theater-concert hall. The major Berkshire Festival concerts open July 26 and continue for three weeks, on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons.

Ten composers whose works spell out more than two centuries of great music will be represented in the three Berkshire Festival concerts in Tanglewood's Music Shed next week. Charles Munch, music director, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two of these concerts, on Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday afternoon, with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist on part of that program.

Thursday evening's concert will open with Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva", which will be followed by Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony (No. 6). These nineteenth century works will be complemented by two French works of the twentieth century: Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Saturday evening's program begins with the Water Music Suite by Handel. Bela Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion follows, and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite, Number Two, and Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3, with Organ, will conclude the concert. The Ravel suite is to be performed with a chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and composed of students at the Berkshire Music Center. The organist for the Saint-Saens work will be E. Power Biggs.

Mozart Concert Attracts 5,300 to Tanglewood

By CARL E. LINDSTROM
Special to The Hartford Times

LENOX, MASS. — Time was when the pre-festival Bach-Mozart concerts were Tanglewood's most important feature, while the big shed programs drew the crowds. Saturday night's phenomenal outpouring of 5,300 listeners for an all-Mozart concert proved that this series has become as popular as it is important. In the early days such a crowd was reckoned a good one for a Sunday afternoon Brahms-Tschaikowsky concert.

I have seldom heard Mozart played with fire but that was the element which Munch imparted to the first and last movements of the Haffner Symphony and to the finale of the great E flat. To the latter Symphony's initial allegro and to the adagio which precedes the Fugue for strings were added nobility and no little passion.

This passionate quality, when discoverable, is of course inseparable from the composer's primal urge for melodic expression and perfection of design. It is an objective mania far removed from personal sentiment.

The clarity and neatness of Munch's projections handsomely illuminate music in which the design is fundamental if not paramount. A person who never has heard of the sonata form could get a very good idea of it from a single Munch performance of a Mozart symphony. His care for it was not, however, a matter of preoccupation. It was his solicitude for the melodic contour and the rhythmic force which were responsible for the essential vitality of his Mozart interpretations.

WHAT ARE YOU going to do with a piece which is purely decorative and whose length exceeds its specific gravity? The divertimento was created as a back-drop for social festivity; it was for atmosphere rather than for listening. It was probably accompanied by uninterrupted gaiety and conversation in Mozart's day.

It was a tribute to the Tanglewood audience both inside and outside the Theater-Concert Hall on Sunday that the pleasing B flat Divertimento (K287) was listened to so raptly. It is simply a pretty tapestry, exquisite but hardly more than skin-deep.

I think the news here was the perfect fusing of the duo horn tones with the string choir —and the fact that a woman in the audience fainted two minutes before the end. It couldn't have been due to excitement for this is not an exciting piece; rather one to admire.

HUGH ROSS got a demonstrative reception for his able and honest direction of the Missa Brevis at the Saturday night concert. He had a most helpful quartet of soloists in Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The last-named and Miss Spector were superior.

There couldn't have been more than 50 voices in the chorus, but I have heard 200 sing with less power, certainly with less brilliance and security. It was balance which made this performance memorable — balance not only between the vocal parts, but between chorus and orchestra.

Here we have the answer to the desuetude into which choral song has fallen. Most choruses and choirs are open to anybody who feels like singing, so you can't have balance. The instrumental part is seldom properly rehearsed, either for lack of time or money, so you can't get voices and instruments into the right relationship. It is for the learning of lessons of this sort that festivals like Tanglewood have a reason for being.

SUNDAY'S SOLOIST was William Kroll, who stirred a good deal of enthusiasm with the A major violin Concerto (K219). He began diffidently and produced some unpleasant emphasis with slashing up-bow phrases. He made the slow movement delicately articulate and created his real success out of the interesting and showy finale. The audience recalled him half a dozen times.

With lowering skies and everybody momentarily expecting a downpour which did not come, Charles Munch concerned himself with making the Prague Symphony one of the most beautiful experiences of the series.

Musical Reflections In a Country Churchyard

JUL 21 1951

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

WHEN the crowd is assembled and the orchestra is on stage, the expectation that Koussevitzky will walk out of the right wing is irresistable. Tanglewood is the perfect imprint of his personality —his insistence upon luxuriant beauty, and the importance of the frame for sovereign art. Despite its charming history and association, the spot is more important today than it ever was. He made it so.

To grasp the chapter end which has overtaken us it is necessary to visit the country cemetery which surrounds the magnificent old Church on the Hill in Lenox. You walk among the patient, time-smoothened headstones down the slope and away from the murmur of traffic on the Pittsfield pike and there under an umbrageous maple you find a carefully planted square. The new-clipped sod is bordered with sweet alyssum and centered is a large cross in white petunias. At the head of the rectangle are grouped white geraniums, Bermuda lilies and gypsophilia. Neatly lettered in white on black is the simple wooden label Serge Koussevitzky. At a contemplative bench, conveniently placed, the sod is somewhat worn. You reflect a while.

WHAT MEMORIES may be silently rehearsed it is impossible to say, but among the crowds you hear remarkably few references to Koussevitzky. There is no gloom. The explanation can only lie in the acceptance and reconciliation forced upon one by so beautifully completed a life. He reared his own monument; its grandeur and vitality are compelling.

IS IT a coincidence that the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fourth time in succession have gone to Paris for a conductor?

After the catastrophic end of Dr. Muck's career with the orchestra during World War I, Henri Rabaud was imported to take his place. This was the nadir of the Boston Orchestra. But the fault wasn't entirely Rabaud's because the war took its toll in manpower also.

He was succeeded by Pierre Monteux who took important steps toward rebuilding the orchestra and restoring something of its former tonal luster. Had Monteux's tenure been as long as that of his successor, there is no doubt but that he could easily have obtained the same heights of technical perfection, but its style undoubtedly would have been different from that which Koussevitzky came to produce.

Koussevitzky was of Paris Parisian; he was highly acceptable to French audiences; some of his best years were spent in the French capital. And yet the quality which he stamped upon the Boston Orchestra had a certain flamboyance, drama and emotionalism not usually associated with French taste.

The two are not antithetical. His exploitation of Ravel, his association with emigres, Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Scriabin who were more French than Russian, attests his affinity with the Gallic spirit. This flair extends even to those American composers who benefited most by his patronage—Copland, Piston and Harris, all products of the Fontainebleau School, and the influence of Nadia Boulanger. Certainly this Koussevitzky strain was enough to preserve the French tradition.

The succession now is unbroken with the advent of Charles Munch. The signs are already apparent. There is an elegance, a finesse, a terseness, a fastidiousness, which clearly indicate that Boston's is on the way to becoming the greatest French orchestra in the world.

Amusements

The fourteenth season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed opens next Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks the Festival will continue with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts: Eleazar's de Carvalho will conduct August 5; and on August 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first-rate music center each summer.

Since its beginnings in the mid-1930's, the old estate in Lenox which is now the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed into a seasonal attraction for thousands of persons who love symphonic music; last year the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted more than 125,000 persons.

The many interests of Donald L. Engle, press representative and program annotator of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will be glad to learn that he has been named an assistant manager of the famed Orchestra by the Board of Directors. In a letter to the press, Manager Hard McDonald states that Mr. Engle will continue his present duties, and in addition be responsible for administrative assignments.

In the World of Music

Orchestra Nearly Out of Red

The Philadelphia Orchestra Association virtually wound up its 51st season of concerts in the black, Orville H. Bullitt, president, announced. The actual deficit as of May 31, was $23.61, he said.

Bullitt explained, however, that no symphony is self-supporting on ticket sales alone. On its concert operations, the Philadelphia Orchestra incurred a net deficit of $45,520. After applying the $94,543 raised by the orchestra fund to the $49,023 accumulated deficit of past seasons and the deficit for the current season, the total deficit as of May 31, 1951 stood at the $23.61 figure.

Building Loan Not Included

These figures do not include the $267,000 borrowed by the orchestra to buy the controlling interest in the Academy of Music, to assure the orchestra a permanent home.

The orchestra's revenues during the past season included $550,260 in total ticket sales and $343,990 in record royaltie and miscellaneous income, including a grant of $50,000 from the City of Philadelphia.

Chief item of expense was musicians' salaries, travel allowances and the fees for conductors and soloists, totaling $728,226. Transportation, rent, advertising, administrative expenses, pension payments, and other operating costs came to $295,318.

A total of 443,490 persons heard the Philadelphia Orchestra at its 136 concerts this season, Bullitt said, as compared with 44,653 last year at 141 concerts.

Eighty-five concerts were played in Philadelphia, the remainder in 16 cities in 10 states.

11 Nations at Tanglewood

Thirty-three states and 11 countries are represented in the preliminary list of students for the ninth session of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer school.

Nine musicians of varied ages will come from Canada, four from Israel, two each from Holland and Cuba and one each from Norway, Italy, Egypt, Brazil, Mexico and Switzerland. New York leads the states, with 66, including 59 from New York City; Massachusetts is second with 46, of whom 14 will come from Boston, Brookline and Cambridge; Pennsylvania is third with 40; Illinois fourth with 20; Ohio fifth, with 15.

UM Tuba Player With Symphony

Connie Weldon, a University of Miami music student and graduate of Miami Jackson High School, is playing first tuba with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Tanglewood Music Festival at Lenox, Mass., this summer.

Stefan Jones, bandmaster of Miami Jackson High, said Friday he believed she was the only woman first tuba player in the United States with a major symphony orchestra.

Miss Weldon, now in her second year at the university here, plays with the university's orchestra each season. She was formerly captain of Miami Jackson High's band and was considered one of the outstanding high school musicians in the state, Jones said.

The musician is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George F. Weldon Jr. of 9630 Pete Pike rd., Hialeah.

Final Coolidge Concert Tomorrow Night

Moyse Trio To Be Heard At Tanglewood

The Moyse Trio, who will appear at Tanglewood tomorrow evening at 8.15 in the last of the three chamber music concerts given to the Berkshire Music Center by Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress, was created in 1933. The players are Marcel Moyse, head of the famous French Woodwind Instruments School, Louis Moyse, and Blanche Honneger Moyse.

For 20 years professor at the Paris National Music Conservatory, he was solo flutist in the Lamoureaux, Pasdeloup, Colonne and Straram orchestras, the Societe des Concerts du Conservatore, the Toscanini concerts and the Opera Comique. He originated and directed the conductors and orchestra course of the Champs Elysees Theatre.

Louis Moyse, son of Marcel, who plays flute and piano, was connected with the Lamoureaux orchestra and was assistant to his father at the Paris Conservatory. His wife, Blanche Honegger, was a pupil of Adolph Busch and for several years taught viola and violin at the Neufchatel Music Conservatory. She played solos with the Paris Symphony and National Orchestras and appeared as concert soloist in Berlin, Oslo, Stockholm, Copenhagen, Basle and Geneva.

The trio, who have given concerts all over Europe and South America, and who won the International Records prize in 1938 with their recording of the Bach trio in G major, will play the following program:

Trio, Sonate en sol majeur ..... Bach
Duo for two flutes ..... Handel
Trio en ut ..... Haydn-Moyse
Musique en Trio (Mid-summer Night's Dream) ..... Andre Thiriet
Three Interludes ..... Jacques Ibert
Three Pieces for a Trio..Arthur Honegger
Sonz for two flutes and violin, Marcel Gennaro
Serenade for two flutes and viola, Louis Moyse
Trio Sonate ..... Bohuslav Martinu

The program for the first concert by the combined choruses tomorrow afternoon at 4.30 under the direction of Hugh Ross and Alfred Nash Patterson, his assistant is:

In ecclesiis ..... Giovanni Gabrielli
Betty Lou Allen, mezzo soprano; Robert Morris, tenor.
Five Proverbs on Love for chorus a cappella ..... Robert Starer
Spanish Religious Music of the 16th century ..... Arr. Juan Maria Thomas Catalonian Folk Songs.
Four Slovak songs ..... Bela Bartok
Mass in E minor for 8-part chorus and wind orchestra ....., Anton Bruckner

The orchestra players will be from the opera department orchestra.

Both programs will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The evening concert will also be attended by guests of Mrs. Coolidge, by invitation

Blanche Honegger Móyse, Louis Moyse, Marcel Moyse, who will play at Tanglewood tomorrow evening in the last of a series of three chamber music concerts that the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress has given to the Berkshire Music Center this season.

Anyone who claims that music doesn't affect an audience has the ushers at the Tanglewood theatre concert hall to contend with. During the Bach-Mozart series the customers were as easy as pie to handle. But when Haydn was played it was just one thing after the other; people lost programs, couldn't find junior, or had to be led to their seats after intermission. Haydn confused them.

—o—

Tanglewood often confuses strangers. Saturday night before the concert we saw a party of eight come through the gate, spot the empty Shed, and cry, "Oh, we can get good seats. There's no one there." They made tracks across the lawn. The last we saw, they were settling comfortably in the blue section. A few minutes later, the concert started in the theatre music hall, about a quarter mile away. There were no good seats left there.

Railroad Running Low-Cost Train To Tanglewood

The New Haven Railroad is helping to attract music lovers to Tanglewood by circulating a hand-bill in turquoise blue advertising a special low round-trip fare of $6.75 for the three Sundays of the afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, in the Music Shed.

For approximately the cost of a single trip to Lenox, a music lover may ride to Stockbridge, be transported to the Tanglewood grounds, where he will have a picnic lunch or a snack served at the canteen, hear the concert, and go by bus to Pittsfield, where he will take the train back to New York. The fee will include all transportation, general admission and taxes. Tickets must be purchased in advance. The train will leave Grand Central at 8.15 and return at 11.30.

Mozart-Programm in Tanglewood

(Sondermeldung für die "New Yorker Staats-Zeitung und Herold")

LENOX, 23. Juli. — Charles Munch dirigierte Samstag und Sonntag das Boston Symphonie-Orchester in einem Mozart-Programm, das die "Haffner"-Symphonie, Adagio und Fuge für Streicher, Divertimento für Streicher und zwei Hörner, das Violinkonzert A-Dur (Solist William Kroll) und die Symphonien 38 und 39 brachte. Hugh Ross leitete im Samstag-Konzert die "Missa Brevis", K. 192, gesungen vom Festival Chor; das Werk wurde zum erstenmal im Rahmen der Berkshire-Festspiele aufgeführt.

Die Missa Brevis stammt aus dem Jahre 1774; Mozart hatte knapp das 18. Jahr erreicht und während eines kurzen Aufenthaltes in Wien Anregungen erhalten. Er kehrte Ende September 1773 nach Salzburg zurück und schrieb dort eine dreisätzige und vier viersätzige Symphonien, das Konzert für Fagott und sein erstes Klavierkonzert in D-Dur (K. 175). Auf dem Gebiete der geistlichen Musik entstanden in dieser Zeit die zweite Lauretanische Litanei und zwei Missaes Breve (K. 192 und 194).

In der Samstag-Aufführung wirkte ein Soloquartett, bestehend aus Gladys Spector (Sopran), Eunice Alberts (Alt), David Lloyd (Tenor) und James Pease (Baß) sowie der Festival Chor mit. Hugh Ross brachte die Schönheiten der Partitur zu bester Geltung, von den Solisten trat die sonore Baßstimme James Peases am wirkungsvollsten hervor. Die Wiedergabe der Haffner-Symphonie und insbesondere der Symphonie in Es zeichnete sich durch Stiltreue aus, Charles Munch bringt alle Nuancen, übertreibt niemals die Kontraste und hebt die Themen klar heraus.

Die beiden Konzerte bildeten den Abschluß der ersten Serie des Kammerorchesters. Donnerstag beginnen die großen Konzerte im "Shed"; die offene Halle bietet 6000 Personen Platz und eben so viele werden auf dem Rasengelände den Veranstaltungen beiwohnen. Freitag, 27. Juli, findet die große Trauerfeier für Serge Koussevitzky statt, an der sich alle Abteilungen des Music Center beteiligen werden. Der Studentenchor singt die Kantate 118 von Bach, die Kammermusikklasse wird Schuberts Forellenquintett vortragen, und eine Szene aus Tschaikowskys "Pique Dame" gelangt zur Wiedergabe. Das Programm wird durch ein Originalwerk eines Musikstudenten, das für diesen Anlaß komponiert wurde, die Egmont-Ouvertüre Beethovens und Stravinskys "Symphonie der Psalme" ergänzt.

Das Studentenorchester veranstaltete sein Konzert am Freitag abend auf der Freilichtbühne, das Programm war ausschließlich französischer Musik gewidmet. Charles Munch dirigierte zwei Nocturnes von Debussy, Eleazar de Carvalho brachte drei Sätze aus Berlioz' "Harold in Italien" (Raymond Montoni Solist), Russell Stanger leitete das Orchester in Chaussons Poem (Jeanne Sandbank, Geige) und Pierre Bellugi war der Dirigent in Ravels "Ma mere l'oye".

Das Publikum setzte sich aus den Mitgliedern der "Freunde des Berkshire Music Center" zusammen, die Musiker sind Studenten des Center, die Dirigenten mit Ausnahme Charles Munchs Absolventen der Berkshire Kurse. Die Vorträge sind vor allem durch die Begeisterung und den Eifer der Mitwirkenden bemerkenswert, jeder Einzelne ist bestrebt, sein Bestes zu geben. Diese Veranstaltungen und die Kammermusikkonzerte, Liederabende und Opernvorstellungen bilden den interessantesten Teil der Berkshire Festspiele. Neue Talente werden entdeckt und den jungen Musikern wird Gelegenheit geboten, ihre Fähigkeiten zu zeigen.

Die Konzerte des Boston Symphonie Orchesters bilden mit wenigen Ausnahmen Wiederholungen der Veranstaltungen in Boston, New York und anderen Städten der Winterserien, naturgemäß haben die Vorträge des berühmten Orchesters eine große Anziehungskraft, viele Hörer kommen zum erstenmal nach Tanglewood, um den Konzerten des Bostoner Ensembles beizuwohnen und lernen gleichzeitig die Tätigkeit des Music Center und die bisher unbekannten Musiker kennen.

Es war Koussevitzkys Idee, durch die Kombination der Veranstaltungen von Berufsorchestern und Amateurensembles der Musik als solcher zu dienen. Er hat den jungen Musikern mit Rat und Tat geholfen und viele, die heute zu Ansehen gekommen sind, danken dem verstorbenen Dirigenten diesen Erfolg. Wir werden über die neuen Solisten und Dirigenten noch berichten.

Tanglewood Opera Season Scheduled To Open Tuesday

Lenox, Mass., July 14—The opera season at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open under Boris Goldovsky Tuesday, with Mozart's Impresario, Stravinsky's Mavra, and Comedy on the Bridge by Martinu.

Haydn programs will be given tonight, and tomorrow afternoon by members of the orchestra, with Charles Munch conducting. There will be a chamber music concert tomorrow morning, and a composers' forum tomorrow night conducted by students at the Berkshire Music Center.

During the coming week the Berkshire Trio will play early and modern French chamber music (Wednesday evening), gift of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. Student conductors and one of their teachers, Howard Shanet, will lead the school orchestra Friday evening in its third program of the season.

Meanwhile, Saturday and Sunday, July 21 and 22, Mr. Munch will conduct two Mozart programs. On Sunday William Kroll of Woodstock will be soloist. Tickets and further information will be mailed on application to the box office.

Golden Agers Plan Tanglewood Trip

Golden Age Club members voted to go to Tanglewood Friday evening at the weekly meeting yesterday afternoon at the YMCA. Busses will leave at 5.30 PM, and those attending are to bring a box lunch.

A total of 156 attended yesterday's meeting, and one new member joined the group. Entertainmnet by club members consisted of humorous stories by Walfrid T. Victorsen, Stephen Burns, John Ross and Thomas T. Dumont, and two prize contests conducted by Mrs. Sara [illegible]

Mrs. Carrie [illegible]gren of 33 West Housatonic Street and Mrs. Margaret Kincaid of 25 Union Street won the birthday cake.

Huge Crowd Turns Out for Opera Scenes

Gate Closed Temporarily but Later Reopened

TANGLEWOOD — The popularity of the school events at Tanglewood among Friends of the Berkshire Music Center reached a new high last night at the second opera performance of the season. The staff at Tanglewood was not prepared for the large overflow audience, and when all seats (1200) in the theatre-concert hall were filled, the gate was closed for a short time, but later opened to admit members to the grounds. More than 1000 more turned up for the performance.

Commenting on the situation this morning, George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said, "There has been no change in policy in these matters, but a certain flexibility in arrangements may be dictated from time to time. In general, however, members are eligible to come to all student performances. In case of certain events reserved tickets are issued to the capacity of the auditorium. In such cases Friends who did not apply early enough to receive reserved seats before they were exhausted, will be admitted to the grounds. Orchestral, choral and chamber music concerts present no difficulty.

"In the case of certain opera performances where people want to see as well as hear, it places a heavy strain and responsibility on our limited staff to maintain at all times free exits and free aisles. Safety must come first and those on the grounds for the opera performances, who do not have reserved seat tickets, will confer a great favor on the management if they will accept readily the areas where it is considered practicable and safe for them to remain.

"The management regrets that in the interim last night a few Friends left the grounds and missed the performance."

'SOUNDS FAMILIAR': Miss Florence Wickham, "Pauline" in the first American performance of the opera, "Pique Dame," at the Metropolitan Opera House, listens at Tanglewood to the Berkshire Music Center cast rehearse the opera with Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department. "Pique Dame" will be given at the theatre concert hall next Monday and Tuesday evenings. At Miss Wickham's left are Phyllis Curtin, Lisa; Rosalind Elias, Pauline, and Eunice Alberts, the countess. 'I do not scold them'

Munch, Ready for Opening Shed Concerts, Like His Predecessor, Is a Perfectionist

The arrival at Tanglewood of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct the Berkshire Festival, adds another personality to the list of famous men and women who have made of the Berkshires a center of culture since the middle of the last century.

Charles Munch is one of six children of Ernest Munch, an organist and professor at the Conservatory of Music in Strasbourg and the daughter of a French Protestant minister in Paris. The elder Munch founded the famous choir of St. Güillaume. All his children played an instrument. Fritz conducts the Municipal Orchestra in Strasbourg, where Charles was born and where he was concertmaster in 1919. Emma married a brother of Albert Schweitzer, famous biographer of Bach and Goethe.

Six feet tall, slender, though with broad shoulders, graceful and gray-haired, Munch, at 58, is a handsome man, with a winning smile. Appearing shy, except when he is conducting, he likes to escape when a concert or rehearsal is finished to study his scores, read, play solitaire or canasta or a few holes of golf. One night last week, after a Mozart program, with another the next afternoon, he stayed up until 2 AM for a game of canasta, which he won. Fond of good food, he eats sparingly. He likes good clothes, which he buys in France —crepe-soled shoes, suits made to order.

Madame Munch, a Parisian, is a granddaughter of the founder of a French chocolate company. They were married in 1933, having known each other since his student days. Madame Munch's interests are literary. She is the author of "Novelles du Limousin" and the translator of Thomas Mann's "Toni Kroeger" from the German into French. Like her husband, she is unpretentious, preferring to see her friends informally, rather than at large parties. She slips into her seat at Symphony Hall like an ordinary concert-goer. She is spending the summer at their home in Monteux, Switzerland, where her husband would have joined her after completing his schedule of conducting engagements in Europe, had he not been called to Tanglewood by the death of Serge Koussevitzky.

Visited Here in 1948

In the Berkshires for the first time, except for a brief visit in 1948 to his friend, Arthur Honneger, the French composer who suffered a heart attack a week after he had arrived to teach at the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Munch appreciates the beauty of the country. He comments often on the views and the trees, comparing them with those of the Vosges at home. He enjoys also his large house in Milton, which he occupies during the symphony season. He likes to walk in the garden and surrounding country with his airedale, Pompi. In Switzerland he climbs mountains.

During the Tanglewood season he is living at Elm Court, until her death 10 years ago the home of Mrs. Henry White, widow of the former ambassador to the Court of St. James's. A doorway was cut to give him a two-room suite on the quiet side of the mansion that is now leased as a summer inn by the owner, Mrs. Helm George Wilde, granddaughter of Mrs. White.

Started to Study Medicine

Charles Munch did not always intend to be a musician. When he was 21 he went to Paris to study medicine, but he enjoyed his violin so much and played so well that he gave up a physician's career to study with Lucien Capet. This career was interrupted in 1914 by World War I. He was wounded at Verdun. Between wars he studied violin, taught at the Strasbourg Conservatory and became concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig under Furtwaengler and Walter. When he learned in 1929 that he must become a German citizen or give up his job, he went to Paris, where he founded the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, conducted the Lamoureux Concerts and the Straram Orchestra. After a round of guest engagements, he succeeded Philippe Gaubert in 1937 as conductor of the Paris Conservatory Orchestra, holding the position through World War II, taking no Nazi instructions and aiding the Resistance.

In 1939 Munch attempted a trip to the United States to conduct the St. Louis Orchestra, but because of travel restrictions was turned back at the Azores. In 1946 he crossed the Atlantic to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, and a month later the New York Philharmonic. In 1948, commissioned by the French government, he conducted the National French Radio Orchestra on a coast-to-coast American tour. In 1949 he succeeded Dr. Koussevitzky as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although Munch is described, as "French to his fingertips," one need not fear that his programs will contain a disproportionate number of French compositions. From his first lessons in violin with his father at the age of six, until he left Strasbourg his education in German music was so thorough that Bach, Beethoven and Brahms are as familiar to him as the Berlioz for which he is especially famous. He is said to be equally at home with the Russians.

He is liked by orchestra members, audiences and critics. When he took over the directorship of the Boston orchestra, at his first rehearsal, he said, "I hope we shall work very hard together—and with much joy."

"I make them like what they play. I do not scold them," he told an interviewer. Though he is kind, he has an air of authority, and the men respect him. One critic has said that the orchestra is more flexible under him than it has ever been before. He is a serious, conscientious worker. Five minutes after he arrived at Tanglewood he was holding auditions for soloists in the Bach Magnificat, in D. Like his predecessor, he is a perfectionist.

Audiences and critics at Tanglewood, as in Boston and wherever he has conducted, are enthusiastic in their praise of his musicianship, of his manner of conducting and of the results. While they may at first comment on a lack of showmanship, "you feel," as one critic has expressed it, "that he is above it." His Bach, Haydn and Mozart have won enthusiastic praise, and overflow audiences. There is every indication in the box office that the Shed concerts that commence tomorrow night will be at least as well attended as in previous years, and that the Tanglewood lawns as well as the Shed will be crowded to hear him conduct Berlioz, Brahms, Franck and contemporary composers.

Memorial Service in New York For Dr. Koussevitzky Tonight

LENOX—To commemorate the 40th day of his death, a memorial service will be held tonight in a Russian Orthodox church in New York for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and founder of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. The service will be held at the Russian Orthodox church at 59 East Second Street.

Attending the service at which Bishop John of Brooklyn, N.Y., will officiate will be the late conductor's widow, Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, and her sister, Duchess Anna de Leuchtenberg, who is now living at Seranak, the Koussevitzky home, for the summer. Duchess de Leuchtenberg arrived recently from Nice, France, with her three daughters, Anna, Olga and Natalie, who are now members of the Festival chorus at the Berkshire Music Center. They plan to live permanently in the United States.

Before leaving for New York this afternoon Mrs. Koussevitzky, her sister and family attended a brief memorial service for Dr. Koussevitzky at his grave in the Lenox Cemetery-on-the-Hill. Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the Congregational Church, officiated.

Mrs. Koussevitzky will return to her Lenox home late tomorrow afternoon. She plans to attend several concerts at Tanglewood in the next few weeks. She was present at the opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center and last Saturday evening attended the concert in memory of her late husband in the theatre-concert hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch conducting, and the Festival chorus presented the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion. Following last Sunday afternoon's concert Mrs. Koussevitzky entertained at her home near Tanglewood, Mr. Munch and several trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

More than 300 musical associates, friends and guests crowded into the Church-on-the-Hill, Congregational, Sunday evening to hear a brief memorial musical tribute to the late Dr. Koussevitzky. Noted artists, associated with Koussevitzky at Tanglewood and in the music world, presented a program devoted to the late conductor's favorite selections. Artists participating included Ruth Posselt, Richard Burgin, George Moleux, Jean Bedetti, Joseph de Pasquale and Alfred Patterson.

Present in the audience which filled the ground floor of the historic church were students and teachers from Tanglewood, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and townspeople of Lenox. Faculty members at the Music Center attending the service who had worked with Koussevitzky were Leonard Bernstein and Gregor Piatigorsky.

Rev. J. Herbert Owen, pastor of the church, read the 103d Psalm, Koussevitzky's favorite, and gave the benediction.

Bernstein Will Lead Tanglewood Program Friday

Tanglewood, July 17—Leonard Bernstein, conductor who is heading the orchestra and orchestral conducting department at the Berkshire Music Center, will lead the student orchestra Friday evening in the music shed at Tanglewood in Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony.

The second half of an all-Russian program, it will be preceded by three numbers to be led by students of conducting. Bernardo Federowski of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, will conduct Moussorgsky's "Prelude to 'Khovanstchina' ". Tchaikovsky's "Concerto for Violin in D major will be conducted by Robert Mandell, with Armin Steiner playing the solo. Lorin Maazel will take the baton for Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra with chorus. The chorus will be prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson.

The chamber music group, directed by William Kroll, will give a concert Sunday morning at 10.30, playing Brahms' Quintet in B minor for clarinet and string quartet; Aaron Copland's Vitebsk (Study on a Jewish Theme) for violin, violincello and piano; and Debussy's, Quartet in G Minor.

Both performances are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. Information will be mailed on request to Tanglewood, Lenox.

HUB ORCHESTRA MANAGER HITS SUBSIDY PLAN

Kiwanis Hear Judd Discuss Music Problems Of Day

Pittsfield, July 25—George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, told the Kiwanis Club this noon that the United States is not yet ready for subsidies for art and music. Mr. Judd said "Subsidy is good only when it is understood by those who administer it."

Cites 400 Orchestras

Introduced by Arthur Birchard of Lenox, the symphony manager told his audience that 25 years ago there were not over 15 top flight orchestras while today there are nearly 500 municipal orchestras of first class standing. The number of listeners to symphony music has grown in proportion, he said.

The problems facing the orchestras today are shortages, including string instrumentalists, competent conductors, business managers, and money. The last commodity he said is not the most important because too much money sometimes is worse for an orchestra than too little. There are more persons studying the oboe in Eastman School of Music today, he said, than there were playing the instrument in all sections of the country in 1915. String players are not taking advantage of their possibilities and opportunities.

There also is a question of getting enough good new music. The musical world is more fortunate than the art world in this respect, he told the group, because 15th century music is still acceptable but 15th century plays are not.

He traced the growth of music from the time of the princes, who treated musicians as servants or worse. All forms of such support he said have begun with the letter P. First the princes, then the patrons, such as Flagler, Clark and Higginson, who supported the Boston Symphony for many years. Now the public is the supporting force and this is the only stable element, in the long run, for any art. Mr. Judd would not trade the present interest of the public in music for the next P, which would follow in the wake of subsidy...namely the politician.

The politician does not know what is good for music and musicians. Admitting that a form of subsidy now exists in the matter of education in public schools along musical lines he said this should be increased.

The tax on entertainment should be relaxed, he felt, because after the public had paid the ticket price and the tax it was necessary to go back to the same people to ask for money to make up the annual deficits.

Most symphony orchestras take in about 50 per cent of their expenses at the box office. The Boston organization does better than this but the deficit approaches the tax money each year. Deficits cannot be measured in money when it comes to music, according to Mr. Judd.

Eight Works By Mozart Programmed

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS.—Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will perform eight works by Mozart next week-end at Tanglewood in two programs of unusual variety. With a chorus from the Berkshire Music Center, the group on Saturday evening (July 21) will present the rarely heard Missa Brevis, K. 192. Soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. This work will be led by Hugh Ross. In the featured work on Sunday afternoon (July 22) William Kroll will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto in A Major.

In addition to the mass, Saturday's concert will include the Haffner Symphony, No. 35; the symphony in E-flat, No. 39; the Adagio and Fugue for strings, K. 546; and the Serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K. 525. This performance of the Missa Brevis will be the first at the Berkshire Festival concerts.

Next Sunday afternoon's program consists of the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K. 287; the Violin Concerto in A Major, William Kroll, soloist; and the Prague Symphony, No. 38.

These programs of music by the incomparable 18th Century master, Mozart, will conclude the series of six chamber orchestra concerts in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall. The major Berkshire Festival concerts, held in the larger Music Shed, will begin on Thursday evening, July 26, and will continue for three weeks, with concerts on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. Mr. Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been making his first appearance with his orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct all but two of the Shed concerts; the others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

State and Local Police Ready For Influx of Cars to Festival

Lieut. Stronach Ask Co-operation of Motorists—Area Towns Assign Officers To Direct Traffic on Concert Nights

The Massachusetts State Police, the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the towns of Lenox, Stockbridge, Lee and Pittsfield are co-operating in an effort to facilitate the movement of traffic before and after the Berkshire Festival concerts. Twelve officers from Troop B headquarters in Northampton will handle the traffic under the direction of State Police Lieutenant Theodore H. Stronach.

Taking several men from each of the stations at Pittsfield, Lee, Monson, Russell, and Shelburne Falls, in order that no station will be undermanned during the nine concerts that will start tomorrow night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the lesser crowds for the Bach, Haydn and Mozart performances in the past three week ends have been used for practice, with three officers more than last year because of the new cut-off on Route 20.

They will be distributed as follows: One at either end and one at the intersection of the cut-off leading into the center of Lenox; one at each of the three Tanglewood gates on Route 183, one on Hawthorne Street at the gate leading to the box parking space, one at the junction of Hawthorne Street and Route 183, one at the junction of 183 and the road leading over the mountain to Richmond, one patrolling on a motorcycle from the Tanglewood entrances to the Patterson-Eggleston Monument in Lenox, one patrolling on a motorcycle from the bridge in Lee to the Lenox-Pittsfield line, and one at East Lee directing traffic coming west to Route 7 on Route 20 to detour through Stockbridge, in order to relieve congestion at the Lenox monument. Two officers who will not be needed the entire time will be detailed to guard the money from the ticket sale until it can be removed to the bank.

Proud of Record

Lieutenant Stronach is proud that in past years accidents have been held to a minimum, despite excess traffic under unusually crowded conditions on narrow roads. There have been only one or two of a minor nature, resulting in such negligible damage as a dented fender. He wants to point out that Tanglewood, like other estates in the vicinity was originally meant for private use, and the roads were adequate under those conditions. He urges patience on the part of the audiences and the public who happen to be driving through the Berkshires at the time of concerts, and that they understand that the police are doing everything in their power to improve the movement of traffic under adverse conditions. While trying to facilitate the movement of traffic, he pointed out, the police never lose sight of a possible emergency of fire, accident or illness, and try to keep an exit in case of necessity.

The officers will be at their posts at 6.30 before evening concerts and 1.15 on Sundays, remaining until they are certain that all excess traffic is removed from the roads, and returning in time for the exodus from Tanglewood after the performances.

Plans are made months in advance by representatives of the orchestra, the state police and the towns, and an engineer from the Department of Public Works, who meet to discuss any new problems that might arise as well as the old ones. Additional officers are assigned to handle traffic within the towns of Lenox, Stockbridge and Lee. An effort is made to select men for duty who are acquainted with the area, so that they may answer questions intelligently, such as those about food, lodging and routes, asked by persons from distant places who need advice.

Praising the efforts of the orchestra management, under George E. Judd and Thomas D. Perry Jr., to arrange for the comfort and convenience of the crowds who attend the concerts, and of Michael J. Sullivan, in charge of policing the Tanglewood grounds, Lieutenant Stronach said, "We realize the Festival is doing much good directly and indirectly to people in this area. It puts it on the map. It may seem that we are doing a service to Tanglewood, but it is just as important to provide free movement for the man driving through as to enable another man to attend the Festival concert. Three years ago the smaller concerts were no problem at all, but their attendance has increased. Some people say we should have wider roads, but we cannot afford to spend the money they would cost for nine days out of the year."

Maps Available

Maps of the region and the grounds are issued at the box office. Snacks and light meals may be bought before the concerts and picnic parties are encouraged. As many as 200 groups were counted last season on a Sunday noon. The grounds will open at 6 on weekdays and 12 Sundays. The garden will be lighted for at least an hour after each evening concert. With "Tanglewood on Parade" Lieutenant Stronach said, there is no difficulty, as everyone arrives at a different hour from 4.30 on.

A retired state police sergeant and a deputy sheriff with 21 years experience, Mr. Sullivan posts from three to five officers, authorized to arrest, on the grounds outside of the concert halls. No one has ever been evicted, but they are there in case of emergency. They know as much as the guides about such things as the history of Tanglewood.

Guides, parkers and grounds police are under the direction of Frank Patterson, head of the music department at the North Shore Day School in Winnetka, Ill., who with his wife, Ellie lives at the boat house on the Tanglewood shore of Stockbridge Bowl. Mrs. Patterson is hostess and Daniel Daykin of

Mozart Programs Will Be Presented in 'Tanglewood' Under Ross, Munch

By E. V. W.

This date in music: 1914: First public performance of "Le Coq d'Or," by Rimsky-Korsakov, in Drury Lane Theater, London. A private performance had been given in 1909 in Moscow.

CONCERTS OF UNUSUAL variety by the incomparable 18th century composer, Mozart, will be presented next week-end in the Theater-Concert Hall in the Berkshire Music Center in "Tanglewood" Lenox, Mass.

MEMBERS OF the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Charles Munch, will play Saturday night, and with a Chorus from the Center, Hugh Ross conducting, offering a rare Mozart Mass—the Missa Brevis, K.192. Soloists in the mass: Gladys Spencer, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass. In addition, the Saturday night program will include the Haffner Symphony No. 35; the Symphony in E Flat No. 39; the Adagio and Fugue for String, K. 546 and the Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K.525.

The Sunday afternoon concert will feature William Kroll, soloist, in Mozart's Violin Concerto in A Major. The program will include the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K. 287; and the Prague Symphony No. 38.

IN THE THEATER-CONCERT Hall last night Seymour Lipkin, young American pianist, played the D Major Piano Concerto by Haydn, the Orchestra led by Charles Munch. Included in the program: the Haydn Symphonie Concertante with violin, cello, oboe and bassoon; the G Major Symphony, No. 88 and the London Symphony, No. 104. Concluding the Haydn concerts, this afternoon's program comprises the Violoncello Concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist, "The Clock," No. 101; "Drum Roll," No. 103, and "Oxford" No. 92, Symphonies.

MAJOR CONCERTS of the Berkshire Music Festival will start Thursday night, July 26, in the Music Shed, with concerts Thursday and Saturday nights and Sunday afternoons for three weeks. Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct all but two of The Shed programs; the others to be led by Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar De Carvalho.

6,400 Attend Tanglewood Opening

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 9—Two all-Bach programs yesterday afternoon and Saturday night opened the 1951 summer concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

A record-breaking 6,400 persons, 1,000 more than the number who attended last year's opening week end, saw Charles Munch make his debut as new music director for the Berkshire Festival. The French conductor [illegible] the Boston Symphony for two full seasons, but had never conducted at Tanglewood.

Saturday night, Mr. Munch dedicated the final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew," to his predecessor, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. It is the first in a series of memorial concerts scheduled by the orchestra and by the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, the symphony's school founded by Dr. Koussevitsky.

Mme. Koussevitsky slipped into a side seat in the little Theater-Concert Hall in time to hear Mr. Munch offer the choral selection for "the great leader, the great master, the creator of the Berkshire Music Center." The entire audience stood for a moment in silent tribute as the chorus finished.

The Festival Chorus, a student ensemble directed by Hugh Ross, almost took the spotlight from the orchestra in both opening performances. The powerful young voices were magnificent in the lusty music of "Der Zufriedengstellte Aeolus," (Aeolus Pacified), Bach's secular cantata. Soloists with the group were Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass.

Programs for the week end also included the Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 6, the Concerti in C major and D minor for three pianos and strings, and the choral "Magnificat," in D major. Trio pianists were Irving Fine, Ralph Barkowitz and Bernard Zighera.

All-Mozart Music Weekend Program At Tanglewood

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will [illegible] their Theater-Concert Hall series at Tanglewood's Berkshire Music Center this weekend with two all-Mozart programs, one Saturday evening at 8:15, the other Sunday afternoon at 3.

The programs for these two concerts will be as follows: Saturday: Symphony No. 35 ("Haffner"), the rarely-heard early "Missa Brevis," the familiar and beloved "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, and the Symphony in E Flat, No. 39; Sunday, the Dicertimento for Strings and Two Horns, The 38th Symphony and the A Major Violin Concerto with William Kroll, violinist who performed last season with the Hartford Symphony Orchestra, as soloist.

Tickets for seats in the Theater-Concert Hall are generally sold out well in advance. For information concerning possible turn-ins, one should call the box-office at Tanglewood via the Pittsfield, Mass., exchange.

General admission tickets to the grounds, however, at a cost of $2 are usually available at the box office prior to the concerts.

Lightning Punctuates Tanglewood Memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky

LENOX, Aug. 9 (AP) — The rumble of thunder and the flash of lightning tonight dramatically punctuated the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Koussevitzky memorial performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" at the Berkshire Music Festival shell.

Despite threatening skies, some 8000 sat in rapt attention as the reverent and somber tones of the orchestra and singers paid tribute to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the Tanglewood concerts.

Record Crowd at Festival Enthusiastic Over Munch

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—Charles Munch received a generous and eager ovation at the end of yesterday afternoon's Bach concert in the Theatre Concert Hall as a record-breaking crowd turned out for the opening of the Berkshire Music Festival.

6400 at First Concerts

Saturday night a crowd of 3600 attended the concert, 900 more than the opening night attendance a year ago and yesterday afternoon 2800 filled the concert hall to overflowing, bringing the week-end total to 6400, which represents 1000 more than the attendance for the first week end of 1950.

Mr. Munch has completed two full seasons with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston but he had never appeared at Tanglewood before Saturday night when he led an ensemble of some 30 men in the opening concert of this season's Bach-Haydn-Mozart series.

Yesterday he closed the concert with his most effective work of the week end when he conducted the Festival chorus in the "Magnificat" with a distinguished list of soloists of which Phyllis Curtin was soprano, Edith Evans, mezzo, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. Before intermission he had conducted the concerto for three pianos and strings in which the soloists had been Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera. Hugh Ross led the chorus and orchestra with a quartet of soloists in the secular cantata, "Aeolus Pacified" to open the program.

Tribute to Koussevitsky

Saturday night Munch made a touching short address before playing the final chorus of the "St. Matthew Passion" in honor of the memory of the late Serge Koussevitzky who died on June 4. He requested the tremendous audience to refrain from applause and to stand for a moment of silent tribute to "the great leader, the great master."

A record audience for opening night greeted the conductor new to Tanglewood and although the initial reception was kindly there was an implied challenge that he would have to prove himself. The applause at the end of the first evening and again at the conclusion of yesterday's concert proved without question that Munch had established himself in the Berkshires purely on his merits. His is an individual manner. There is a complete absence of falderal. His facial expression as he bows to his audience has a friendly warmth but he does not delay with such matters. He is on and off the stage with strict alacrity.

The passing of his illustrious predecessor made new plans necessary swiftly. Munch stepped in to assume not only the duties he had agreed to share in the early preparations of the season but also those which Koussevitzky was to have undertaken. His musicianship was not on trial. That has long been conceded but there was natural curiosity concerning the man who was to bear the responsibilities up to now laid on the able shoulders of the internationally renowned artist whose name was practically synonymous with Tanglewood.

It is debatable whether a man would voluntarily choose an "ordeal by Bach" for such a situation. In any case Munch's Bach afforded the audiences variety and color over a strong and solid base. Saturday night there were four of the Brandenburg concerti. They did not reach equal altitudes. It is possible that Munch was not familiar with the peculiar acoustic problems of the open-sided and open-backed hall in which these concerts, originally intended to be on the intimate side, were played. For if he were, we assume he might have allowed more tone to have been produced in passages where he restrained the orchestra and, in the three-piano concerto, the soloists.

First-Chair Men Fine

The first-chair men of the Boston orchestra played the solos which fall to their lot in the Brandenburgs with their expected distinction. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, played with musicianly articulation in his several assignments and the flutes of Georges Laurent and James Madsen, the oboe of Ralph Gomberg, were highly commendable. The trumpet in F in the F major concerto, No. 2, was blown directly into the printed copy on the desk, thus robbing it at least of some of its brilliance.

Munch omitted the two-chord bridge between the movements of the G major concerto with which he opened the series, nor did he inject a selected slow movement from another Bach source as has been the custom on previous performances of this concerto. The tonal balance in the sixth Brandenburg, for violas and celli only, came a degree below full satisfaction, particularly in the second theme in the violas where the droning celli overshadowed the poetic lyricism of the theme.

The coming week ends will be devoted to Haydn and Mozart respectively, and then, the entire remainder of the orchestra will come up from Boston for the three weeks of concerts in the great Music Shed by the entire Boston Symphony.

Wife Mowed Down

The condition of Mrs. Ernest Hopaker of Canaan, N.Y., who was brought to Pittsfield General Hospital with severe lacerations yesterday afternoon, who described as not serious today.

According to New York State authorities, Mrs. Hopaker was injured when her husband, driving a power mower, ran into her.

Music Notes

Holders of box and reserved seats for this evening's "Tanglewood on Parade" program at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, will be entitled to attend a performance of Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball" this afternoon at 4:30. The Center's student orchestra, opera department and chamber music groups will give programs at 6 o'clock, and a choral concert of contemporary music will begin at 7. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert at 8:30.

MUNCH EXCELS AT TANGLEWOOD MAJOR CONCERT

Opening of Series Shows Rare Talent of Noted French Conductor

By WILLARD H. CLARK

Lenox, July 26—There was an air of expectancy among the music lovers who thronged the music shed and the grounds at Tanglewood tonight. This was the opening of the three series of concerts which will be given in the shed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch. The excitement was engendered, we believe, by the fact that many of these people were meeting Mr. Munch for the first time.

Familiar to Many

Others who had heard him conduct the works of Bach-Haydn and Mozart during the past weeks knew that this unassuming French conductor had captivated his audiences by his personal charm, his gentle, yet decisive manner of conducting and by his willingness to let music speak for itself. But how would he handle the larger works which make up the repertoire of the shed concerts?

The answer came quickly. With the closing notes of the noble music which Mozart wrote following the death of two friends who were free masons one was able to relax, secure in the knowledge that the Boston Symphony Orchestra was under the musical direction of a rarely sensitive musician, a conductor with the feeling and knowledge to interpret the great orchestral works in a manner to hold the interest and bring out all the beauties and colors of the scores.

The Mozart "Masonic funeral music" was written during July, 1785, after Mozart lost two dear friends. This is noble music, never melancholy, rather music which reaches towards the heights, for to Mozart "death is the true end of our life."

Symphonic Poem

Schumann's "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor" is the most integrated of all his symphonies. It may well be called a symphonic poem, a form which is based upon the irrefutable assertion that there is no break between two successive emotional states. Schumann first thought of this symphony in terms of a symphonic texture. There is seldom any recapitulation, always there is new thematic material to hold the listener.

Mr. Munch conducted the work with great devotion. He can summon mighty fortes when he wishes. But it was in the unveiling of the subtle nuances that he was at his most persuasive. The Romanza was revealed through incomparable beauty of tone and there was just the right lilt and brilliance to the finale.

Great Interpretation

During May, we heard Mr. Munch direct a performance of Berlioz's "Requiem" in Boston. It was a magnificent performance by one entirely en rapport with this composer. Tonight we heard an even greater interpretation of the Berlioz "Symphonie Fantastique," that bizarre and macabre symphony born of frustration.

Munch has been written of the motives which might have given birth to this creation. The sensational character of the music might well have been used to attract public attention—which it did. But something more than normal reactions lie behind the writing of this symphony which goes far beyond the classical proprieties of that era.

We have never listened to a more engrossing reading of this symphony. Munch delved deeply underneath the surface and found there beauty as well as ugliness. There was a torrential power in "March of the Scaffold" and final "Dreams of a Witch's Sabbath," sardonic beauty in the "Waltz" and imagination in the unfolding of the pastorale-like scene in the field.

Mr. Munch and the players were given a real ovation at the close of the performance. We noted Mme. Serge Koussevitzky in her box and also Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who appeared as narrator in "Peter and the Wolf" with Dr. Koussevitzky last summer.

Saturday night the program will open with the overture to "Oberon" by Von Weber. This will be followed by Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 6 in E flat major." The final portion of the program will be given over the performance of the Brahms "Concert for Piano No. 2 in B flat major." Claudio Arrau will be the pianist.

Koussevitzky Kin Attend Concert

Tanglewood, July 26—The first of the major concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival in the shed at Tanglewood was heard tonight by an audience in the neighborhood of 7000. Not only was this exceptionally small number a bewilderment after having seen record crowds arrive for the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series in the theater-concert hall on previous week ends but considering that the first number on this evening's program was in memory of the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky whose 77th birthday would have been celebrated today. It was surprising that there were so many empty seats within the shed tonight.

In the boxes were Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, her sister and his three nieces who attended for the memorial number Mozart's funeral music in honor of her late husband. Here in tribute to Conductor Charles Munch was French Ambassador and Mrs. Henri Bonnet who are week-end guests of Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Jackson.

Notables seen in tonight's audience included Juan Maria Thomas of Majorca, Spanish musicologist and choral conductor; Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge, and Mr. and Mrs. Albert Spalding, the latter both summer residents of the Berkshires.

During intermission Madame Henri Bonnet, wife of the French ambassador, was presented a bouquet of flowers by Dr. Arthur Bissaillon of Pittsfield on behalf of the Franco-American Clubs of North Adams and Pittsfield.

A program change for the Sunday afternoon concert of Aug. 5 was announced tonight. That program will now include Weber's "Overture to Euryanthe," Trauss' "Death and Transfiguration," Prokofieff's "Piano Concert No. 22" featuring Jorge Bolet and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition." The popular conductor, Eleazor De Carvalho will lead the orchestra in this program.

MUSIC

Berkshire Festival

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At The Shed, Tanglewood, last evening, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opening concert of the full orchestra series; the program follows:

Masonic Funeral Music (K477) in memorial of Serge Koussevitzky — Mozart
Symphony No. 4 in D minor — Schubmann
Fantastic Symphony — Berlioz

By ELINOR HUGHES

LENOX, July 26— On an evening as beautiful as only the Berkshires can produce in late July, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, opened the first series of full orchestral concerts in the shed. The audience was very large —if not entirely capacity—the applause was enormous, and the occasion was one of very great general satisfaction.

That there was more than a suggestion of looking backward as well as looking forward to the proceedings was only natural, for this is the first year that Serge Koussevitzky's dynamic presence has been missing, a thought present in the minds of the listeners and enforced by the playing, as the opening number on the program, of Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a memorial tribute to the man whose vision and unrelenting labor made Tanglewood a reality and not just a beautiful dream. One man conceived it, but the music world has now taken it to their hearts.

Reports on the success of the season so far are really exciting. The series of chamber music concerts in the preceding weeks of July were entirely sold out, and there is the accustomed rush for seats for the subsequent Shed concerts, which continue through this week, next week and the week after. Tonight's attnedance totalled about 5000 in the Shed itself and 2000 in admissions besides. The only thing that was lacking for complete satisfaction was a full moon, but even for tanglewood, the lunar calendar couldn't be juggled with.

Present in the audience were many distinguished musicians and music lovers from Boston, New York and elsewhere. Including Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, the French ambassador and his wife. Madame Koussevitzky honored the occasion with her presence, so that her's and her husband's many friends could feel that Serge Koussevitzy was here in spirit if not in visible presence.

The program following the Mozart Masonic funeral music—at the end of which the audience and the orchestra rose and stood for a moment in silence—consisted of Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. The Schumann was played with unusual fire and brilliance, as though Mr. Munch and the orchestra were more than ordinarily inspired in their interpretation of a work that can sometimes be rather less than inspiring.

As it was, the music seemed charged with melodic beauty and soring imagination, the composer's inspiration, like the poet's eye. Rolling forth in a fine frenzy. The Berlioz, grandiose, romantic, packed with tonal images and expansive orchestration, brought the evening to a truly exciting close. That ovations for Mr. Munch and the orchestra followed both symphonies, is hardly to be wondered at—they were richly deserved.

Mr. Munch will conduct the second program of series A tomorrow night. This will consist of Weber's overture to "Oberon," Prokofieff's Symphony No. 6 in E flat minor and Brahams' piano concerto in B flat major, with Claudio Arrau as soloist.

Notes and Footnotes

SOMETHING rather nice, a kind of affability pervades Tanglewood this summer, at least in the upper echelons. And uppermost, of course, is Conductor Charles Munch himself. We had made what was certainly an unreasonable enough request; that we might chat with Mr. M. sometime before the Shed programs started. Despite the pressure of the coming big show, he fixed for us to come to his dressing room right after yesterday's rehearsal, at 7 PM.

Through a mixup in signals, we stumbled unannounced into the dressing room, and found Mr. M. changing his wringing shirt. His iron-gray hair was tousled, he looked shaggy and exhausted and might well have been in a bad humor. On the contrary, however, he greeted us pleasantly.

We had a few stock questions and led off with, "Are you nervous about the opening Thursday in the Shed?" He grinned widely, tapped us in a friendly fashion on the arm and said, "No. Not in the least. Not with this wonderful orchestra playing."

This would be the first out-of-doors concert he's conducted, and though they've rehearsed diligently in the great Shed, he has yet to learn how it will sound when full of people. "When it's empty," he said with a spreading gesture, "the sound goes out . . . a little flat."

His long experience with European orchestras has in no way biased Mr. Munch. "This orchestra," he said with feeling, "compares with any in the world. It's with the best." When it came to the American concert audiences he was equally emphatic. "They are," he said earnestly, "first class." Tanglewood, he allowed, was rather different from Europe's famous Salzburg. "Here everything is newer, younger, fresher," he explained it. "The atmosphere is different."

The Lenox country-side, he says, somewhat resembles his home section about Strasbourg, and we learned later that when being chauffeured about by Leonard Bernstein or George Judd will remark of this or that spot, "A nice place for a home." H'm.

When he passed us on the road a bit later in a Pontiac, he waved cheerily. Tanglewood tales have taken a new turn.

Students To Hear Voice Recordings Of Koussevitzky

LENOX—Students of conducting and composing at the Berkshire Music Center have been invited by Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky to her home Seranak tomorrow afternoon to hear recordings of remarks by her husband. They will also hear a record of the tribute paid to him on the radio June 5, the day following his death, by William Schuman, whose works he often conducted.

Mrs. Koussevitzky has included in her invitation students in composition because the majority of Dr. Koussevitzky's recorded speeches are about composers. They will be accompanied by Aaron Copland, Irving Fine, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar deCarvalho, their teachers.

Henri Bonnet Arrives Here Full of Hope

French Ambassador Optimistic About United W. Europe

Henri Bonnet, French ambassador to the United States, arrived at Union Station here this morning full of optimism for a coming united states of Western Europe.

"We are building it stone by stone," he said, "first in the economic field, which is the most important. When the walls of tariffs will be broken between the six Western European countries — as they will be by the Schuman plan —it will be a very promising start towards a real federation.

"The integrated European army will be the second step. The third one will be in the agricultural field," predicted the ambassador, one of the most notable French visitors to Pittsfield since Lafayette spoke in this city in June, 1825.

The tall, distinguished-looking 63-year-old ambassador spoke of the "strong movement" on the Continent for European unity, led by the French government.

"There is a new spirit in my country in that respect," he said. "We are pressing for the beginning of a Western European federation through the Schuman plan and the Plevin plan for an integrated European army."

Here for 24 hours, the French ambassador and Madame Bonnet will be the guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Tanglewood concert tonight, when their countryman, Conductor Charles Munch, makes his first appearance here with the full orchestra.

The BSO is reciprocating, for the 104 members of the orchestra and Mr. Munch were entertained by the Bonnets at a buffet supper at the French embassy in Washington last February.

The couple, who arrived here at 10 this morning, will be guests of Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Jackson in Lenox. They will leave tomorrow for a short vacation at Northeast Harbor, Me., unless unexpected embassy business forestalls the trip.

Mr. Jackson, formerly publisher of Fortune magazine and now head of the National Committee for a Free Europe, was described by Ambassador Bonnet as "an old friend of mine who was in Algiers with me during the war. He was head of the information service of the U.S. Army; I was myself in charge of information for the cabinet of the French Provisional Government."

The French conductor, Munch, and the French ambassador met for the first time in Washington a few years ago when the former brought the national French orchestra on an extensive American tour. "It was a grand occasion," the ambassador recalled today.

The Bonnets arrived here from Detroit, where the ambassador took part earlier this week in the 250th anniversary celebration of the founding of the city by the Frenchman Cadillac.

He explained that work in Washington has become "more and more pressing," requiring him to spend most of his time at the embassy. "But Detroit was an exceptionally important occasion," he said, "and Tanglewood is too."

Their chauffeur drove up from Washington last night with the Lincoln Cosmopolitan and Madame Bonnet's black French poodle, Luli. The two stayed overnight at the Sheraton, and while waiting for the Bonnets' overdue train at the station this morning, the chauffeur curried the six-year-old, Washington-born 'bilingual dog.'

Shed Concerts To Open Tonight With Memorial to Koussevitzky

TANGLEWOOD—Dedicating its opening number to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, its music director, will open the Berkshire Festival in the Music Shed tonight, on the 77th birthday of its leader for 25 years. At the first rehearsal Tuesday afternoon Mr. Munch, asked for a minute of silence in memory of his predecessor. Tonight's concert will be the conductor's first at Tanglewood with the full orchestra.

Mozart composed the Masonic funeral music in Vienna in 1785, on the death of two fellow Freemasons, the Duke Georg August von Mecklenburg-Strelitz and Franz Count Esterhazy von Galantha. It is appropriate that it should be played in Dr. Koussevitzky's memory, as he loved the music of Mozart above that of any other composer, though so far as is known he never conducted the funeral music in this country. The audience will not applaud.

Robert Schumann's fourth symphony will be the second number, composed in Leipzig in 1841 and performed at a Gewandhaus concert in that year. In revised form it was played at the spring festival of the lower Rhine a year and a half later.

The Berlioz "Fantastic" symphony, written in 1830, was first performed in December of that year at the Paris Conservatory, Habeneck conducting. The composer wrote that it was a part of "the history of my love for Miss Smithson, my anguish and my dreams," but later in his memoirs he wrote that he composed it "while still strongly under the influence of Goethe's 'Faust.'" It takes a very full orchestra—more than 100 players with six tympani that represent distant thunder. Mr. Munch commissioned bells to be cast in France, in C and G, in a foundry near Paris, for use instead of the tubular chimes that are ordinarily played to give the effect of bells of a French church.

Music critics from distant papers and foreign correspondents will be in the audience to hear the French conductor in his debut at Tanglewood.

Tickets are on sale for all Festival concerts at the box office, Tanglewood, England Brothers and the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge. General admission may be purchased the day of the concerts at the box office.

Music Center Program Dedicated to Founder

The students at the Berkshire Music Center will dedicate their entire program tomorrow evening to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky who died June 4, less than a month before the opening of the school which he founded in 1940. All departments will participate to honor the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who had been the inspiration and the only director since it was established.

The program follows:

Choral Department:
Cantata No. 118 ..... Bach
John H. Krueger of Knoxville, Tenn., conductor.

Chamber Music Department:
Trout Quintet ..... Schubert
Jeanne Sandbank of Boston, violin; Annie Denton of Binghamton, N.Y., David Moshe Amitay of Israel, cello; David Moore of Chicago, bass; Audun Rayman of Granville, Ohio, piano.

Composition Department:
Psalm III, a motet for women's chorus and four trombones.
Raymond Wilding-White
An original composition for the occasion, conducted by the composer.

Opera Department:
Scene 6 from Pique Dame . Tchaikovsky
Boris Goldovsky conducting concert version.

Orchestral Department:
Symphony of Psalms ..... Stravinsky
Lorin Maazel, conductor; chorus prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson.
Funeral March from Eroica Symphony, Beethoven

The concert is open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Berkshire Festival Opens Thursday In Music Shed

The Berkshire Festival in the music shed at Tanglewood is commencing this weekend with three of the nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch, its music director. For the opening number Thursday evening, July 26, Mr. Munch will conduct Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of his predecessor, the late Serge Koussevitzky, whose 77th birthday it will be.

The first program will include, also, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic. Saturday evening Claudio Arrau will play the solo in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto. The other works will be Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. Sunday afternoon the orchestra will play Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal", Copland's "Quiet City", Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Next Thursday evening, August 2, Mr. Munch will conduct Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva", Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony, Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole and Roussel's Third Symphony. Saturday evening, August 4, Mr. Munch will conduct Handel's Water Music, Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe, for the first time at Tanglewood with chorus, and Saint-Saens' Third Symphony with organ. Eleazar deCarvalho, Brazilian conductor, will take the podium for the Sunday aftternoon program, which will include Guarnieri's Second Symphony, Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 2, Jorge Bolet, soloist, and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition".

Meantime, rehearsals will be open Saturday mornings at 10 for the benefit of the pension fund of the Boston Orchestra, and students and faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, the Orchestra's summer school, will give performances daily or twice daily for its Friends. Friday afternoon, July 27, at 4:30 they will present compositions of their contemporaries. Friday evening, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, they will give a program representing each of the school departments: the Bach Cantata No. 118 by the chorus; an original work written for the occasion by a member of the composition department; Schubert's Trout Quintet by the chamber music department; a concert version of a scene from Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame"; Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, the latter especially loved by Dr. Koussevitzky, commissioned by the orchestra for its 50th anniversary in 1930.

E. Power Biggs, organist of the Boston Orchestra, will play Saturday afternoon at 3: Concerto in G major (Antonio Soler); Prelude in B minor and Piece Heroique (Cesar Franck); Sonata in C minor (Julius Reubke). Sunday morning at 10 the chamber music group will perform Boccherini's Quintet in C major; Hindemith's Quartet No. 3 and Mozart's Quintet for winds and piano in E flat major.

Monday and Tuesday evenings the opera department will present Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" for members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center whose applications were received early enough to secure seats. The small choir will sing again Friday afternoon at 4:30, and at 8:15 in the shed the school's symphony orchestra will perform, conducted by student conductors and one of their teachers.

Ticket and program information will be supplied on application to the box office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

A bill is pending before Congress which would remove the 20 per cent taxes. It has passed the House and is now in a Senate committee. The bill got as far as the Senate last year and was then thrown out.

After giving a historical resumé of how music has been supported in the past, Mr. Judd told the Kiwanians that he did not believe that symphony orchestras should have direct subsidies at the present time.

In the beginning it was the princes who financed music, then it was the patrons, and now it is the public. Mr. Judd said he was leery of adding a fourth P, the politician because "officials on the whole aren't aware of what is good for music."

Mr. Judd spoke following the Kiwanis Club buffet lunch at the Sheraton Hotel. Tanglewood Center Is Conductors' Paradise

By FRANCIS A. KLEIN
Globe-Democrat Music Critic

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS., July 15.—What the students at the famous music center here can accomplish in a remarkably short time was graphically illustrated Friday night when the student orchestra performed. They have only four days in which to ready a program which would give the professionals many a pause.

Several of the dozen or so St. Louisans who are students here play in the orchestra, including Lowell G. Bearden, violin; James Alexander, oboe, and Tom Benton, flute.

The concert was held in the Music Shed, a drab name for an engineering marvel designed by Eliel Saarinen, whose design also was chosen for the Jefferson National Expansion River Front Memorial in St. Louis.

The Shed here is under a half-acre room which will seat 6500 and as many as 15,000 can be accomodated by utilizing the grassy spaces at the rear. The acoustics are so perfect that even a whisper from muted violins will carry with startling clarity from stage to the farthest reaches without amplification. The fortissimos are such as seldom are heard in a concert hall anywhere.

CONDUCTOR'S PARADISE

This is a conductor's paradise, and it's no wonder that Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho take delight in leading these students. There is enough and to spare of everything, so that the 120-piece symphonic orchestra can boast two harps and all the battery effects desired, as well as enough strings of all categories to give a rich, sonorous tone not unlike that of the Boston Symphony itself.

Serge Koussevitzky's preoccupation with singing strings hasn't been forgotten since his death, and the Tanglewood strings do the founder proud.

In fact the tone these youngsters produced, after less than a week's work, was astounding. Professionals could cry "bravo" at themselves for it. Programs of professional depth are commonplace; nothing seems over the heads of these eager players. Without batting an eye, they tackled Ravel's Mother Goose suit, Chausson's Poeme, Debussy's Clouds and Festivals and Berlio's Harold in Italy. This is championship stuff, not to be fooled with. They carried it through splendidly.

Student conductors Piero Bellugi and Russell Stanger, and student soloists Jeanne Sandbank and Raymond Montoni exhibited a surety of technique that made one blink. The orchestra was not only eager and alert but superresponsive, and when working with Munch, the Debussy specialist, and de Carvalho, the South American rhythm master, rose to virtuostic heights. Tone production and color, graduated dynamics, controlled vibrancy, weight and mass. All the elements of superb orchestral instrument were here. The styling was infinitely varied to suit the needs of such diverse composers as Ravel and Debussy.

OVATION DESERVED

The players, boys and girls mostly 18 or so, deserved the ovation accorded them by an audience distinguished by its coughless, riveted attention. Even the kids were quiet, a sure sign that something of more than passing interest was going on.

In fact, there's always something going on at Tanglewood. E. Power Biggs, noted organist, gave a recital yesterday afternoon and last night the Boston Symphony, under Munch, gave the first of two weekend festival concerts. Haydn's music was featured, the orchestra doing the Symphony No. 80 in G Major, the piano concerto in D Major, with Seymour Lipkin as soloist, the "Longer" Symphony and the Symphonie Concertante.

This afternoon, Haydn again was featured, with Gregor Piatigorsky, who heads the chamber music department here, doing the cello concerto, and the orchestra providing the "Drum Roll," "The Clock" and the "Oxford" symphonies.

SUPERIOR HAYDN

Altogether, it was superior Haydn, well up to the Boston standards, although nothing like the full orchestra was required for these more intimate works of the so-called "Father of The Symphony." Because of their nature, they were played in the Concert Hall rather than the Shed.

Winding up a full week of activity was a composers' forum given over to discussions of modern works. Included were the Sonatina for Winds by F. James Brown of New York City; Senato No. 2 in F-Sharp Minor by Darius Thieme of New York City; The Adagio Molto for violin and piano by Noel Farragut of Bronxville, N. Y.; the piano piece by Robert Pitton of Columbus, Ohio; the second trio for strings, "Lament for Joseph," by Robert Parris, and the Raymond Wilding-White "Madrigals," with Alfred Nash Patterson conducting.

It was a fitting climax to a long look at this rather breathtaking music center which is doing so much to shape the minds and techniques and musical values of those who will be writing, playing or conducting our serious music tomorrow. What one says is encouraging indeed as to the future of that music. Tanglewood, the late Serge Koussevitzky and those who are carrying on the work now deserve a special bow for the accomplishment.

Music Students Learn Fast at Tanglewood

By FRANCIS A. KLEIN
Globe-Democrat Music Critic

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS., July 14—Tanglewood Tales as told by Nathaniel Hawthorne, aren't any more wonderful than those told by the dozen or so St. Louis and Missouri students at this famed music center founded by the late Serge Koussevitzky.

"You learn more here in six weeks than you do in six months elsewhere," says Lowell G. Bearden, violinist who is studying orchestral and chamber music work.

"Make that six years," put in Peggy Phillis, the young soprano who made such a hit as Lady MacBeth in the Opera Workshop's production of the Verdi work last season in St. Louis.

"This is a wonderful place," amends Alice Cataldi, who is doing violin work.

"Wonderful," echoes her sister, Helen, who is in the opera department. "The will to work is almost unbelievable. We get a chance to learn almost more than we can take in."

WORK TOO HARD

"Yes," said Murray Blumfeld, an instructor in music at Washington University who is assistant to Boris Goldovsky in operatic coaching and stage direction here, and who also is something of an old-timer at Tanglewood. "Some of these youngsters work almost too hard," he said. "They don't have to be prodded. On the contrary, they have to be restrained, so that they have some fingers or voice left."

The others were of the same opinion. John T. Dunivent of Webster Groves, an artist in his own right, is finding unlimited scope for his talents in the designing of scenic and stage settings in the opera department, where Rachel Twente, also of Webster, is learning more and more about costume designing and fashioning.

OTHERS STUDY

Also studying opera are William Sandidge, whose remarkably flexible bass won recognition for him from the Women's Association of the Symphony; Betty Doogan, James Taylor, Marjorie Moehlenkamp and Mary Darnell. The latter is attending Tanglewood on a scholarship, as are some of the others, and is coaching with Paul Ulanovsky, famed pianist for such singers as Lottie Lehmann. At home she studied under Gerhard Schroth and Leo Miller, and has been featured on the radio. Her background is somewhat typical of the kind brought to Tanglewood by students. All have already gone far in music, but hope to go much further after instruction here.

Among the other instrumentalists from the St. Louis area is James Alexander of Brentwood, who is studying oboe, and from clear across the state in Kansas City is Thomas P. Benton, who already has made quite a reputation for himself as solo flute player, having given recitals in France and in Boston.

PRACTICE IN SHADE

It was fun to follow the students around and look in briefly on some of their class-room work. Not all the work is done in the class-room. One can frequently find little groups here and there in shaded, grassy places on these beautiful grounds, diligently practicing on their own time. But it's in class where theory almost instantly is translated into direct action. Take Boris Goldovsky's Operatic Department, for instance.

There are some 45 students in it, and they are rotated in various roles so that all get a chance to sing Aida, Amneris, Tosca, Suzanna, or whatever it might from the standard repertoire. dynamic Goldovsky, his rathe nasal twang made familiar to millions through his radio work in connection with the Metropolitan Opera broadcasts each Saturday during the season, is everywhere, coaching, instructing, even pleading, but always illustrating.

APPLIES VITALITY

He knows opera inside out, word for word and note by note, but much more than that he can get the students into the vitalness of the parts.

"No, no, no" he stopped a student pair. "You don't walk like that. A fellow with nothing on his mind does so, yes, but not you—you have a lot on your mind. You love this woman, remember?" And he acts out the part to perfection, humming the tune or singing it in a true but indescribable voice. Then he goes to the piano and with the fleet fingers provides the accompaniment for another run-through. When the lesson ends, the students know vastly more about opera than they did before, and the lesson moreover has been leavened with Goldovsky's wit so that it seemed but a few minutes long.

HE CHIMES IN

It's the same in William Kroll's Chamber of Music Department. He had a sextett working—two violins, two violas and double celli. Every now and then he'd grab his own fiddle and chime in at a difficult or obdurate part.

"That A-flat doesn't sound right there," a student commented. "Eh, no?" said Kroll. "Play it for me."

The passage was repeated while the violin master listened intently.

"Sounds all right to me," he remarked, "but then, maybe I'm accustomed to the olives. You'll get used to it."

And he went on to stress dynamics and projection. One part, played rapidly, displeased him.

"No, no children," he admonished. "You are too excited. You must get excited only—only . . . I forget, but anyhow never get excited about this music. Now play."

And then they took it through again with a smoothness and ease that would please even a martinet.

EXACTLY RIGHT

The orchestral and choral rehearsals are on the same plane of intense concentration, with no detail too small to be worked over until it is right. Then when the parts are fitted into the whole piece, the pattern emerges bright and clear.

Leonard Bernstein oversees the orchestral work and Hugh Ross the Choral Department. They and their associates and assistants accomplish wonders in the few weeks at their disposal.

Aaron Copland's lectures on American music are especially popular. Copland, whose fame as a composer is secure, is rapidly acquiring a name as a platform man. He points out with complete authority the distinguishing differences in our music now, the roots from which it came and the influences which guided it this way or that. It's solid stuff made palatable by a man who knows how to lecture.

St. Louis Music Artists Do Well at Tanglewood

By FRANCIS A. KLEIN
Globe-Democrat Music Critic

TANGLEWOOD, LENOX, MASS., July 13.—The eyes of the music world are turned toward Tanglewood, a garden spot set in the picturesque Berkshire Hills, more than ever now since the death in June of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, its guiding genius. He didn't found Tanglewood but it reached its peak of greatness under him.

Now, musicians and musical aspirants everywhere, including St. Louis, are wondering what will become of Koussevitzky's plans, his hopes, his dreams for the place. It is regarded as second only to his astounding success with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the list of achievements of this remarkable, many-sided man during his years in America from 1924.

For the moment, nothing will happen to Tanglewood. Nothing will be changed for this season at least. Its ultimate fate is in the hands of the trustees of the Boston Symphony, and, according to George E. Judd, manager, there is nothing afoot now to affect Tanglewood adversely. It would be a shame if Tanglewood died; almost as great a loss to the world as Koussevitzky's death.

WILL KEEP GOING

It's a safe bet, though, that the determination and the means will be found not only to keep it going, but to improve it in all its branches, to make it truly a great monument to a great musical leader—a monument not in cold stone but living and breathing and achieving in the persons of the young musicians trained here.

They come here from all over America, and the world for that matter, and they go back home much better prepared to battle for the cause of good music than when they arrive, but there's something about the very atmosphere of the place which induces additional striving for perfection. The enrollment this summer is some 400, and to this number St. Louis and area have contributed a dozen or so very gifted students who are making the most of their opportunities here.

More about their activities later. First of all it is important to understand just what Tanglewood is and how it achieved a national and international reputation for turning out front-rank musicians, many of them in the artist class. Stanley Chapple, the Little Symphony conductor and for years identified with music in St. Louis, was dean here for years and would be here again except that pressure of his work in the Far West doesn't permit. Dorothy Ziegler, first trombone with the St. Louis Symphony and an excellent pianist, knew the benefits of this place. Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, Gregor Piatigorsky, Seymour Lipkin, Boris Goldovsky and many more familiar on the St. Louis music scene, are members of the faculty here.

Samuel Mayes, first cellist with the Boston Symphony, which plays concerts during the Berkshire Music Festival here, is an all-St. Louis product, having been a pupil of Max Steindel until his flowering talent took him East to become one of the youngest first-desk men ever to play with a first-rate orchestra. He was still in knee pants.

Tanglewood originally was an elaborate estate of some 200 acres put together by a Boston banker, W. A. Tappin, in 1849. Hawthorne lived here for two years a century ago, and immortalized the wild, wooded aspect of these hills in his immortal "Tanglewood Tales." A single glance is enough to convince one of the aptness of the title. If there is any more glorious scenery in America, it has remained hidden all these years.

The estate came to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by gift in 1936, two years before the festival concerts were started, with the Boston Symphony as guest artists. The idea caught hold immediately and year by year the festival improved and lengthened and better facilities were added. In 1940, Koussevitzky, ever a pioneer in music, the man who had taken an orchestra down the Volga into places that never before had heard such music, got a chance to put into practice an idea he had been nursing for a long time.

IDEA CATCHES ON

This was for a music center, or school, to be held in connection with the festival concerts, but still separate from them, for talented young musicians who would thereby have the chance to study with acknowledged artists or leaders in their own fields.

This idea, too, caught on, and Koussevitzky proved himself somewhat surprisingly, an able administrator, and a superb teacher. It was his influence and his keen, penetrating mind which made Tanglewood the goal of young musicians. Among his progeny were Bernstein and Carvalho, who now teach conducting.

Others on the faculty include Aaron Copland, famed composer, joined this year by Luigi Dallapiccola from Italy, whose works have been heard in St. Louis, is reading Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" and other operas in his department; Hugh Ross is directing the chorus; Piatigorsky and William Kroll, the latter known for his quartet work, teach chamber music, and in addition this year there is a new department for music educators, under A. D. Zanzig.

First desk men of the Boston Symphony instruct in their instruments with this setup. It's not surprising that the students here, in an intense six-weeks course, make astounding progress.

Opening Shed Concert Draws Crowd of 7100

Hundreds of Seats Left Vacant— Mrs. Roosevelt, French Ambassador In Audience—Arrau Soloist Tomorrow

TANGLEWOOD — Charles Munch made his initial appearance with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed here last night before a crowd of 7100 music lovers, about 1000 fewer than the opening-night crowd a year ago.

Lawns Covered With Listeners

For the first time in many years there were hundreds of vacant seats in the huge Music Shed but the general admission audience was as large as any opening night concert attracted since the end of hostilities in World War II. The spacious lawns surrounding the Shed were covered with listeners who heard the concert on blankets, deck chairs, camp stools and benches.

The box section was almost filled. Many celebrities were in the middle section of the Shed including French Ambassador Henri Bonnet and Madame Bonnet, who were seated with Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Jackson of Interlaken and Mr. and Mrs. Albert Spalding of Great Barrington.

Mme. Bonnet was presented a bouquet of American Beauty roses at intermission by the Franco-American Club of Pittsfield and the Lafayette Club of North Adams. The flowers were presented by Dr. Arthur B. Bissaillon, secretary of the Franco-American Club.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, widow of the late President Roosevelt, was a guest of Mrs. Beatrice Auerbach of Hartford, Conn. During intermission the French ambassador and his wife greeted Mrs. Roosevelt in Mrs. Auerbach's box.

Nikisch Family Represented

Also here for the opening concert were the two daughters of Arthur Nikisch, who was the third conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1889-1893). They are Mrs. Katharina Nikisch Wollgandt and Mrs. Nora Nikisch Schindler, both of New Jersey. With them was the former conductor's grandson, Andrew Schindler. They remained overnight in the Berkshires to visit Tanglewood today for an inspection of the grounds in the daytime and to meet Mr. Munch.

The first portion of the program was dedicated to Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, founder of the Berkshire Music Center and conductor of the orchestra for 25 years before his retirement in 1949. As a tribute to the famed conductor Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music (K.477.)

Seated in her usual box for the concert was Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the great conductor. With her were her sister, Duchess de Leuchtenberg de Beauharnais and daughters, Olga, Natalie, Anna and Mrs. Maria de Pasquale, wife of Joseph de Pasquale, first violist with the BSO.

second Berkshire Festival concert in the Shed, returned recently from his sixth postwar tour of Europe. He played at the Festival of Britain in London in May and again after his first visit to Israel, appearing with the London Symphony Orchestra under Sir Thomas Beecham and Sir Adrian Boult.

Described by some critics as "the greatest living pianist," he was born in Chile, grew up in Germany and came to the United States for the first time at 23 to play with the Boston Orchestra under Monteux and the Chicago Symphony under Stock. He has appeared 200 times with major orchestras and given 500 recitals in the past 15 years. It is said that at the age of four he could play a movement from a Beethoven sonata at sight. He gave his first recital at five and made his official debut in Santiago at seven. The Chilean government sent him and his whole family to Germany so that he might study with Martin Krause, a last pupil of Liszt. In 1925 he won the International Contest of Pianists in Switzerland. Following a list of decorations by nearly every Latin-American government Mexico named him last season "Favorite Son," the country's highest decoration in the arts.

The overture of "Oberon" with which Mr. Munch will open the program, is from the opera otherwise known as "The Elf King's Oath," which the composer Carl Maria von Weber conducted three days after completing it at Covent Garden, London in April 1826.

Serge Prokofieff wrote his Sixth Symphony in February 1948, four months before a resolution was pronounced by the Central Committee of the Communist Party condemning the foremost composers of Russia, including Prokofieff and Shostakovitch. They were accused of "confusing and neuhophopathic combinations which turn music into cacophony and a choice accumulation of sound." They were accused of "a bourgeois idealogy fed by the influence of contemporary, decadent Western European and American music." It is reported that Prokofieff, whom Bostonians remember from his visit in 1938 as a "serious and uncompromising artist" at the official inquiry turned to Shostakovitch and said, "What do ministers know of music? That is the business of composers."

Take Boxes For Concert Series At Tanglewood

A large number of Holyokers are expected to attend the concert series with Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony orchestra which opens Thursday night in the large music shed at Tanglewood.

Mrs. Edward N. White of 1190 Northampton St., Judge Philip O'Brien of 65 Fairfield Ave., and David R. Schoales of South Hadley have reserved boxes for the music festival which continues through August.

Nine concerts are scheduled for Thursday and Saturday nights and on Sunday afternoons featuring the entire Boston Symphony.

The cure in his sermon transformed the fall of the plane from a grievous accident into a part of the enduring fight against oppression; the head of the resistance in his speech revised the phrase from "Morts pour notre liberte" to "Morts pour la liberte". And the fact that this very small, very ordinary village wished to give such dignity to the occasion was in itself significant. Obviously they'll all split into classes and factions again immediately, but that day, in the church, at the monument and at the fete afterwards, they were all similar human beings with a similar aim and similar hearts.

De Carvalho To Conduct Here Sunday

Eleazar de Carvalho — Egone

GREAT BARRINGTON—A special program of music by Eleazar de Carvalho, Berkshire Music Festival guest conductor, and 18 fellow musicians will be given at the 10:55 service at the First Congregational Church Sunday.

The program will be the second in a summer series given by Mr. de Carvalho at the local church. A string orchestra will be heard Aug. 5.

Sunday's program will be as follows:

Trumpet Voluntary ..... Purcell
Recitative and Prayer ..... Berlioz
Trumpet solo, Arthur J. Kerr.
Choral ..... Bach
Quia Respixit from The Magnificat..Bach
Soprano solo, Leontyne Price.
Catacombae ..... Moussorgsky
Andante ..... Mendelssohn
Triumphal Apotheosin ..... Berlioz

During our recent interview with Tanglewood Director Charles Munch, Leonard Burkat was interpreter, and yesterday we heard from him. It seems that he and Leonard Bernstein went to the same grammar school in Boston 19 years ago, and the similarity of their names caused no end of confusion. In fact, it still does. We indicated that Mr. Bernstein chauffeured Mr. Munch about, when it should have been Mr. Burkat. We're pleased to comb this out, and further learned that Mr. Munch has just taken a test for a Massachusetts driver's license, and passed handsomely. Indeed, he is quite accomplished at the wheel, as part of the test is negotiating the mad traffic circle at the park. Driving among those wild Boston cabs in Paris no doubt was good training for him.

On Aug. 7 Miss Billie Burke, petite screen star, will be 56 years old. No wonder the small fry who hear their grandparents brag of having seen her in old-time Ziegfeld Follies think they're talking of someone else. And if you remember her personally, boy, you're growing old!

Big Audience At Tanglewood Major Concert

An audience estimated at about 7000 attended the first of the major concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood last night.

Charles Munch was acclaimed by the music lovers as he directed the Boston Symphony orchestra in Schumann's "Symphony No. 4 in D Minor," the Mozart Funeral Music" and Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique."

Tomorrow night the program will open with the overture to "Oberon" by Von Weber, followed by Prokofieff's "Symphony No. 6 in E Flat Major." The Brahms "Concert for Piano No. 2 in B Flat Major" will complete the program.

Munch and Bostonians Perform at Tanglewood

By a Staff Correspondent

LENOX, Mass., July 26—The Berkshire festival entered its most intensive phase at Tanglewood tonight, when the complete Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor Charles Munch gave the first of its nine concerts in the vast Music Shed. This was Mr. Munch's first appearance with his full orchestra at tanglewood, although he has conducted a chamber orchestra of Boston symphony players in eighteenth-century programs during the last three week ends.

He began the program with Mozart's funeral music K477 as a tribute to his predecessor the late Serge Koussevitzky who played such an important part in the development of the Berkshire Festival to its present high artistic status and founded the Berkshire Music Center eleven years ago. Two symphonies followed, the Schumann 4th in D minor and the fantastic of Berlioz.

After the performance of the Mozart funeral music, the audience, as requested by Mr. Munch and the orchestra, rose and stood in silence for a minute or more in tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky's memory.

Among the listeners in the boxes were French Ambassador Henri Bonnet and Mme. Bonnet, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and Mrs. Koussevitzky. During the intermission Mme. Bonnet received a large bouquet of American beauty roses from the French-American clubs of Pittsfield and North Adams representing 2,100 families of French dessent in this region.

The attendance was estimated at more than 7,000, leaving few seats unoccupied in the shed, while a good-sized group heard the music from the lawn outside. Listening from the lawn has long been a Berkshire festical custom. The weather had been threatening earlier in the day, but the sky was virtually cloudless by concert time. The usual traffic jam and lines of slowly crawling cars which have often prefaced major Berkshire festival concerts in the past were practically absent before tonight's performance, thainks to a new road to Tanglewood which by-passes the village of Lenox.

Virgil Thomson's review of this concert will appear in Saturday's Herald Tribune.

Berkshire Festival Opens Tomorrow

The 14th season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed opens tomorrow night with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch.

For the next three weeks the festival will continue with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5, and on Thursday, Aug. 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tomorrow's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to Oberon, continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and concludes with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, Claudio Arrau will be soloist.

Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barter's Overture, The School for Scandal; Aaron Copland's "The Quiet City"; Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

MUNCH LAUNCHES TANGLEWOOD FETE

Conducts Opening Concert of Berkshire Music Festival—Koussevitzky Is Honored

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 26—As fate would have it, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at Tanglewood in the first of the symphonic concerts of the fourteenth Berkshire Music Festival, on the date that would have been the seventy-seventh birthday of the late Serge Koussevitzky, the musical founder of this famous festival. For twenty-five years, Mr. Koussevitzky held the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that height of technical and interpretative excellence which has given these festivals their international reputation.

The memory of Koussevitzky, who died on June 4, and his immeasurable services to the Boston Symphony and its public was observed by the performance of Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music at the beginning of the concert. Mr. Munch, in a few words from the stage, requested that the audience stand for a silent moment in homage to the departed. Thereafter he proceeded to the main works of his first festival appearance in the Music Shed with the Boston Symphony.

For this occasion he wisely chose two works for the interpretation of which he is justly celebrated. The first of these was Schumann's Fourth symphony. The second, which concluded the evening, was Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," a work in the interpretation of which Mr. Munch can have had but few rivals.

Strongly Contrasted Scores

Nor would it be easy to imagine two scores more strongly contrasted in spirit and matter than these—the poetry and introspection of Schumann, the blazing and impetuous tone drama of Berlioz. In each work Mr. Munch seemed especially at home, and especially communicative. His Schumann is replete with understanding and sensitiveness which no amount of training or experience, by themselves, could have brought him. His Berlioz is even more to the manor-born and inescapably effective.

By the side of the Schumann music, the "Symphonie Fantastique" was of the more striking color and impact. The two works set each other off in a singularly effective manner. There are those who find the Munch reading of the "Fantastique" over-strenuous and so dramatic that our nerves have been drained of the power to respond to the music before it is over. For ourselves, this reading is as remarkable for its delicacy and suggestion in the passages of more subtle nature as it is for the dramatic fury of the "March to the Scaffold" movement and the finale.

Perhaps the first movement is the finest achievement of them all in its passion and poetic feeling. Every phase of its emotion, every fleeting impulse or mood is most flexibly and intuitively revealed. It is true that "The Scene in the Fields," never too easy to sustain in its appeal through the entire movement, can easily begin to drag or lose atmosphere in a big open-air auditorium; nor does it do any good to hurry its tempo a trifle to overcome this handicap. But the "March to the Scaffold" and the finale—"The Witches Sabbath"—are still of an evocative intensity and were projected with sweeping power and temperament.

At the end of the performance there was an ovation for Mr. Munch and his men from an audience of between 7,000 and 8,000.

Funeral Music (K. 477) in memory of Serge Koussevitzky ..... Mozart

Elegiac and Powerful

LAST Thursday evening's concert at Tanglewood was the seventh in this season's Berkshire Festival but the first employing the full Boston Symphony Orchestra and taking place in the great shed. Charles Munch conducted. The early parts of the program were dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky. These observances consisted of a section from Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music (K. 477), sedately and circumspectly rendered, and Schumann's Fourth Symphony, which took on under the circumstance an elegiac tone most welcome and suitable. After the funeral music we all stood for a moment in silence.

Then came the evening's big number, which was the Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony", itself one of music's grander displays of sound and, in the hands of Mr. Munch, one of our time's most stimulating musical experiences. In an expeditious reading (under forty-five minutes) and highly dramatic, the work poured forth from the beginning with such mercurial flexibility and such powerful accents that in the final witches' sabbath it really seemed as if all hell were let loose, along with the Boston Symphony.

The continuously vivid effect of the whole was the result of huge liberty on the conductor's part. Fearless alterations of the composer's marked speeds and loudness enabled him to sweep the work forward with a spontaneity and a romantic violence ever so becoming to it. And the expertness of his musicians permitted him freedom in this regard without grave losses to precision. The reading was neither traditional nor scorewise correct, but to this listener it was convincing and overwhelming. When one remembers how rarely a comparable effect is achieved and how certainly it was the composer's wish, one is grateful to Mr. Munch as conductor for having avoided all the textual pedantries that in the first three movements of this piece tend more often than not, by sheer accumulation, to frustrate it.

Another aid on this occasion was the acoustical peculiarities of the shell in front of which the orchestra plays. Tending toward a damping of the higher brilliancies and augmentation of all the lower and heavier sounds, this shell is not, in general, becoming to the strings, which it darkens. But it gives roundness and carrying power to the brass and amplification to woodwinds, so that in climaxes involving a brass display an effect can be achieved as of a whole military band.

These acoustics, as you imagine, were not of benefit to the Schumann Fourth Symphony, though the conductor's reading of it was a lovely one. Neither did they help the Mozart funeral music, which needs, for pathos, sweetness in the chromatic string lines to contrast with the somber chords of brass and woodwind that support these. Nevertheless, it was a pleasure to hear this noble music and a satisfaction to associate one's love of it with the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, whose own nobility of character and consecration to music's excellence have permanently enriched our lives.

Chamber Music Series Ended By Moyse Trio

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

In the third and final concert of the chamber music series presented at the Berkshire Music Center through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation in the Library of Congress, the artists were Marcel Moyse, flute; Blanche Honegger-Moyse, violin and viola; and Louis Moyse, piano and flute. They played a program of the classics for the first half and after intermission turned to contemporary music.

Marcel Moyse, the elder, eminent composer of well-known flute instruction methods, was faithful to his chosen instrument during the whole evening. Madame Honegger-Moyse and her husband, Louis Moyse, interchanged violin and viola on the one hand, and flute and piano on the other, so that every conceivable combination of ensembles was played. The viola and flute have an especial affinity, it proved, and in combinations where they were used the unity of tone quality was remarkably fine.

After trios of Bach and Haydn and a flute duo of Handel, they arrived at music of this day, by Andre Thiriet, Jacques Ibert, Arthur Honegger, Marcel Gennaro, the elder Moyse himself, and, to close, a trio-sonata by Bohuslav Martinu. It was a coincidence that three of these composers were in successive years on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center: Martinu, Honegger, and Ibert.

In the main the music was peaceful and agreeable but only in rare instances was it stimulating. In the Moyse serenade for two flutes and viola there was the most action of the evening; in the remainder there was mainly a bucolic, hazy, innocuous mood in which the competence of the performers blended with the character of the music.

The main interest of the program was its value to the young people of the Center school who constituted such a large share of the audience which filled the theatre-concert hall. In this respect the sponsors cannot be thanked enough for the series which has brought such unusual music for the pleasure and edification of the students as well as for all those others privileged to attend.

(Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky presented Mrs. Coolidge a corsage in lieu of the bouquet of flowers which Dr. Koussevitzky presented to her annually in appreciation of the gift of the concerts).

Munch Makes Music Shed Debut With Tribute to Koussevitzky

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Charles Munch, making his formal Music Shed debut at Tanglewood last night at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a performance which reached the heights of the best Berkshire Festival traditions. With a program of the Schumann fourth symphony and Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" he drew upon the entire rich resources of his famous orchestra and played with an affluent palette of color, contrasts and sensational effects.

By a very odd coincidence this opening concert in the Festival occurred on the birthday of the man whose personality had been responsible in such a major way in building the venture from a tent-sheltered nomadic existence to a permanent structure, both physically and artistically. Serge Koussevitzky would have been 77 yesterday if he had not passed away on June 4, and to honor his memory, Mr. Munch, in a deeply impressive manner, opened the concert with the Masonic funeral music of Mozart and asked the audience "not to applaud and to keep standing for a minute of silence." This Mozart is not the tragic mourning of the "Eroica" but an adult recognition of nature's intransigence and as such was most suitable for the occasion.

The juxtaposition of Schumann and Berlioz was striking. Both were the children of that wonderful first decade of the past century, both slightly of questionable rationality and both pioneers if in different directions. It was a tribute to the conductor that he was able so clearly to distinguish between the styles of the softer Schumann and the more violent Berlioz. Berlioz has been reaccumulating recognition in the last few years, after periods of being ignored, and this recurring interest is not without some credit to Tanglewood, for he has been listed on programs there with, for us, very pleasant frequency.

Audience Enthusiastic

The story of the "Fantastic" has been told by Berlioz himself and then interpreted by biographers. It isn't necessary to judge that phase of the work except to realize that there was a tremendous conflict going on in his mind which was just bursting for expression. That he did it successfully is the measure of his musical genius; that Munch conveyed it to the enthusiastic audience is the record of the event last night which so auspiciously introduces to Berkshire Festival audiences a man to replace a personality which had been so inextricably identified with Tanglewood.

Munch made Schumann flow with a tender warmth. True, there are many passages of lively tempo and animated spirit but the impression remained of an intimate sympathy, the more so when one recalls the heroic violence of the following Berlioz. Munch made the contrast definite and clear. The orchestra played with all its abundant means. It was natural (and no inconsiderable display of sagacity) that the finale of the Fantastic would arouse an enthusiastic response, but we were hardly prepared for the degree of drama which Munch injected into it. In the "Dies Irae" he had used real bells of genuine sonority which would have gratified the composer beyond computation. Berlioz went to extravagant lengths to achieve effects he desired and only with reluctance did he give in to substitutes and replacements. He must have wept to have to accede to his publishers' dictum and inscribe "2 Campane o pianoforte." He didn't even want the tinkle of the ordinary orchestral pipe. He got what he wanted last night and the effect was melodramatic.

But it wasn't only in the fury of the symphony that Munch scored. He was equally as telling in the softer moments. The ball scene had been replete with grace and gentleness as had been the Schumann Romanze. Here he struck a most comfortable and comforting pace, and fitted it unmistakably in the unified progress of the whole symphony. Schumann didn't sacrifice any spontaneity in the reworking of his symphony although it is the work of an artist mature in his thinking. On the other hand, Berlioz is obviously the 26-year-old Don Juan, Don Quixote and Robin Hood combined. That ominous and tragic "March to the Gallows" is no oldster braving death. Munch conjured up all these pictures for us with graphic timing and a vivid imagination. The ovation was as exciting as it was deserved.

Tanglewood Programs Announced

(Special To The Republican)

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. July 13—From one to three performances are scheduled for nearly every day of the coming week at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Following Haydn programs Saturday night and Sunday afternoon by members of the orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, a chamber music concert Sunday morning and a composers' forum Sunday night by students at the Berkshire Music Center, the opera season will open under Boris Goldovsky Tuesday with Mozart's "Impresario", Stravinsky's "Mavra" and Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge".

The Berkshire Trio will play early and modern French chamber music Wednesday evening, gift of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, and student conductors and Howard Shanet, one of their teachers, will lead the school orchestra Friday evening in its third program of the season.

Mr. Munch will conduct two Mozart programs Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, July 21 and 22, to conclude the three weekends in the theater-concert hall that will give place to the concerts in the music shed by the full Boston Symphony Orchestra Commencing July 26. Saturday's program will consist of the "Haffner" and E-flat Symphonies, the Adagio and Fugue for strings and the "Missa Brevis", the last to be conducted by Hugh Ross. Sunday's concert will include the Divertimento for strings and two horns, Violin Concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist, and the "Prague" Symphony.

A chamber music performance Sunday morning and a composer's forum Sunday evening will again be given by the students, as on each Sunday through the Festival. All morning performances start at 10:30, afternoon at 3 and evening at 8:15. Excepting Festival concerts, they are open to friends of the Berkshire Music Center, to which voluntary contributions for the support of the school constitute membership. Ticket and program information will be mailed on application to the box office.

GREAT MEN CAST A SHADOW. USE IT

This past month Serge Koussevitsky died. I am not musically inclined, although I enjoy good music. But for most of the years of his stewardship as director of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, I've gained pleasure and creative capital from sitting at his feet in a very real sense. Having observed at least three of the Orchestra's conductors as well as many visiting guest conductors, I think I have come to understand some of the reasons for his greatness, characteristics that are as necessary in a writer or a painter, in a word, in any creative artist, as in a musician.

Not everyone liked his programs. Does every successful story achieve universal popularity? But nearly everyone recognized his musicianship and his high integrity as an artist. He gave much and demanded much. I have seen him lay down his baton, stop the music and start a symphonic movement over again—when his orchestra was not functioning as he thought it should. I have seen him lay down his baton and with never a glance at his audience, wait for the noisy, insulting intrusion of late comers at a break to die down. I have seen him turn and with that Mephistophelean withdrawn smile acknowledge the applause of those same insincere patrons whom he so plainly did not admit into his secret inner world of music. I have seen him smile with touching pleasure when his audiences—on rare occasions—sublimely fused with his men, stamped their appreciation of a magnificently inspired performance.

Music was his life, his way of expressing himself and giving thanks for his creation. No one who ever saw these scenes, or the even rarer moments when the passion of his art led him to risk taking the spotlight away from one of his guest conductors by sitting in the audience, will ever forget how much music & the finest craftsmanship meant to him. But technique alone counted little for him. His devoted sharing of the rewards of fine work with his men and with the artists he offered the opportunity to appear with the greatest orchestra in the world, was an inspiration to all creative folk everywhere. Nothing mattered but Music and the privilege of sharing it with musicians and an appreciative audience. He gave many music writers the opportunity to strengthen their wings, & show what they could do, had to say. Writers can learn what true love of one's art is from him.

'Pique Dame' for Tanglewood

Under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, head of the Tanglewood opera department, students at the Berkshire Music Center will give two performances next week of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," or "The Queen of Spades." Written and first produced in Russia in 1890, this melodramatic story of mystery and tragedy is regarded as one of Tchaikovsky's best operas. It will be held in the Theater-Concert Hall on Monday and Tuesday evenings, July 30 and 31.

The setting of the work is laid in St. Petersburg, Russia, around 1820, and the opera is in three acts, with seven scenes. The libretto was written by the composer's brother, Modeste Tchaikovsky. The version being used at Tanglewood was translated into English by Mr. Goldovsky.

The basis of the opera is a story by Pushkin, who was the source for much in the repertoire of Russian opera. "Pique Dame" was first produced in America in German, at the Metropolitan in March, 1910, under the direction of Gustav Mahler.

The cast for the Tanglewood production includes David Lloyd, Robert Price, James Pease, Mac R. Morgan, Gene Cox, Robert Mesrobian, James Minser, Lawrence Avery, James Joyce, Robert Rue, William Walker, Eunice Alberts, Edith Evans, Phyllis Curtin, Carolyn Long, Rosalind Elias, Patricia Poitras, Martha Wilson, Christina Cardillo, Carolyn Cameron, and Peter Trump.

A group of 50 students also will serve as chorus and dancers; the orchestra is also composed of students.

LENOX, Mass., July 28.—The Berkshire Music Center honored its founder, Serge Koussevitzky, in last night's concert in Tanglewood's music shed. The program, in which all the center's departments were represented, included the first performance of a work composed for this tribute, Raymond Wilding White's setting of the Third Psalm for women's voices and trombones. This was conducted by the composer, a Bostonian who is studying at Tanglewood with Luigi Dallapiccola. The evening closed with Stravinsky's Symphoney of Psalms, which was commissioner by the Boston Symphony for its fiftieth anniversary and introduced to America by that orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky twenty-one years ago.

Lorin Maazel, who conducted this still impressive work for chorus and orchestra, first appeared in New York as a boy of nine in one of the world's fair concerts of 1939; a year earlier, his precocious talent had been hailed at the National Music Camp in Interlochen, Mich. In recent seasons, he has been with the Pittsburgh Symphony as an assistant conductor. Now twenty-two, he directed a performance which suggested that he should become a leader of considerable consequence. There was a sense of understanding and authority in his interpretation of this exacting music. The balance of vocal and instrumental tone, the clarity of detail and dynamic shading were admirable. Alfred Nash Patterson trained the chorus.

Mr. Wilding White's motet provides a striking and skillfully utilized contrast in pitch and musical timbre between the women's voices, in which the higher notes were most often called upon, and the relative depth and darker hue of the trombones; this also contributed to the realization of the work's expressive atmosphere. The style gave an impression of considerable pervasive pungency and dissonance over an underlying melodic basis.

The scene from Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," sung by Pauline Pierce and David Lloyd with Boris Goldovsky, provided a short preview of the performances of this opera here on Monday and Tuesday nights. Bach's 118th cantata, conducted by John Krueger, opened the program, which also included part of Schubert's Trout Quintet and the funeral march from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony under Leonard Bernstein's direction.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its three public rehearsals for the benefit of its pension fund in the music shed this morning, when Charles Munch conducted parts of tonight's and tomorrow afternoon's festival programs, including the second piano concerto of Brahms, with Claudio Arau as the soloist. The rehearsal began under a cloudy sky and continued under a light drizzle, but the audience occupied half or more of the spacious music shed.

Besides the concerto, tonight's concert offered Weber's overture to "Oberon" and Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. Tomorrow's program begins with two American works, Samuel Barber's overture for "School for Scandal" and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," and continues with Schubert's Fourth symphony and Cesar Franck's symphony.

Berkshire Festival is Ready

The fourteenth season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed opens this Thursday, July 26, with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director.

For the ensuing three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3:00 o'clock. Mr. Munch will conduct sevn of these will conduct on Sunday, August 5; and on Thursday, August 9. Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Misses Solemnis, in honor of Serge Kous[illegible], late conductor-meritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first-rate music center each summer.

Munch and Carvalho Conduct This Week's Berkshire Concerts

The Berkshire Festival continues this week, with Charles Munch leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday afternoon, with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist.

Thursday: Schumann Overture to "Genoveva"; Beethoven, "Pastorale" Symphony (No. 6); Ravel, Rapsodie Espagnole; Roussel, Third Symphony.

Saturday: Handel, Water Music Suite; Bela Bartok, Music for Strings and Percussion; Ravel, "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, No. 2; Saint-Saens, Symphony No. 3, with Organ, will conclude the concert. The Ravel suite will be performed with a chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and composed by students at the Berkshire Music Center; the choral part is optional in the score, but is rarely used. The organist for the Saint-Saens work will be E. Power Biggs.

Sunday, Eleazar de Carvalho, conducting: Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 2 (soloist Jorge Bolet); Mousorgsky, "Pictures at an Exhibition." Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration."

Ten Composers For Concerts In Berkshires

Ten composers whose works spell out more than two centuries of great music will be represented in the three Berkshire Festival concerts in Tanglewood's Music Shed next week. Charles Munch, music director, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two of these concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings (Aug. 2 and 4). Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday afternoon, Aug. 5.

Thursday evening's concert will open with Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," which will be followed by Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony (No. 6). These nineteenth-century works will be complemented by two French works of the twentieth century: Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Saturday evening's program begins with the "Water Music" Suite by Handel, an eighteenth-century favorite. Béla Bartók's Music for Strings and Percussion follows, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, No. 2, and Saint-Saëns' Symphony No. 3, with Organ, will conclude the concert.

The Ravel suite is to be performed with a chorus prepared by Hugh Ross and composed of students at the Berkshire Music Center; the choral part is optional in the score, but is rarely used. The organist for the Saint-Saëns work will be E. Power Biggs.

On Sunday afternoon Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct a program featuring Jorge Bolet as soloist in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto No. 2. The remainder of the program will consist of Guarnieri's Second Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" with orchestration by Ravel. This orchestration to the original piano composition was made in 1923 for a Paris concert by Serge Koussevitzky.

Second Week of Shed Concerts at Tanglewood

This afternoon at 3 P. M., Charles Munch will conduct the third and final concert in Series A of the concerts in the Shed at the Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. The program consists of Barber's Overture "The School For Scandal;" Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Symphony No. 4, and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

On Thursday and Saturday evenings this week, Mr. Munch will conduct the first and second in the Series B Shed concerts, and on Sunday afternoon Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct the third and last. The Thursday night program consists of Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "Pastorale;" Ravel's Rhapsodie Espagnole, and Roussel's Symphony No. 3. The Saturday night program includes Handel's Water Music, Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion; Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2, with chorus, and Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3, with organ.

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 5, Mr. De Carvalho will conduct Guarnieri's Symphony No. 2 Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 2, with Jorge Bolet as soloist, and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Picture at an Exhibition."

Tomorrow evening we go to Tanglewood for the first of the big concerts in the Music Shed. Then, on Sunday, we plan to attend again, for it is at the three Sunday afternoon concerts in the Shed that the Tanglewood Festival reaches its peak of perfection.

On these three great occasions color and life and music blend into the highest form of human enjoyment. Tremendous crowds will be there from the far corners of the nation and from lands beyond the seas to hear symphonic music such is heard seldom in a lifetime.

Around about the Music Shed will be a host of youths scattered upon the lawn, content to sit under Berkshire skies enjoying the music from a distance. These are music lovers who have paid an admission charge at the gate and have brought along blankets and chairs, and in many instances picnic lunches, in order to make the day complete.

Admission tickets are always available at the ticket window. At last reports a few good reserved seats in the Shed were still available.

Two Composers To Hear Works At Shed Concert Tomorrow

Boston Symphony To Perform Barber's 'The School for Scandal' and Copland's 'Quiet City' at Berkshire Festival

Two composers will be at Tanglewood tomorrow afternoon to hear their works played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting. Samuel Barber will hear his Overture, "The School for Scandal." Aaron Copland will hear his "Quiet City," for trumpet, English horn and strings. The program will include Franz Schubert's Fourth ("Tragic") Symphony in C Minor and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor. Roger Voisin will play the trumpet solo and Louis Speyer the English horn. Both are members of the orchestra.

Mr. Barber, nephew of the late Madame Louise Homer and a native Pennsylvania, graduated from Curtis Institute (Philadelphia), won the Prix de Rome in 1935 and the Pulitzer Prize for Music twice. His Symphony in One Movement has been played by major orchestras in this country and Europe, including a performance at the Salzburg Festival by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the first American work to be played there. The Overture was not meant as a prelude to an opera, but as an expression in music of the spirit of Sheridan's comedy. In the past season he conducted, at Dr. Munch's invitation, the Boston Orchestra in his Symphony No. 2 at Symphony Hall. Earlier in his career, Serge Koussevitzky, finding his Essay for Orchestra "too short for the audience to fully enjoy the charm," announced that it would be played twice, which it was. He was for two seasons a member of the composition faculty of the Berkshire Music Center.

Wrote Composition Here

Mr. Copland, regarded as one of the most distinguished American composers, wrote "Quiet City" in its present form in Harold Kelley's barn-studio between Pittsfield and Richmond after the first Tanglewood season in 1940. It was written as incidental music for Irwin Shaw's play of the same name, and revised from the score, written for trumpet, to include the oboe and string orchestra. Mr. Copland, pianist as well as composer, has composed for the theatre, the movies, the dance and for concert, has lectured and performed in many places in this country. He has been a member of the faculty of the Tanglewood school since its opening 11 years ago, and is at present chairman of its faculty committee.

Although none of the nine symphonies of Schubert were published during his life time, the Fourth Symphony written in 1816 when he was 19, waiting for performance until 1849 and for publication until 1884, they are now available in 19 different versions, on long-playing records. It is believed that he intended the Fourth for the amateur group in which he played the viola.

The first performance of Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor, the only one he ever wrote, was at the Paris Conservatory in 1889, when the members of the orchestra were opposed to it, the subscribers bewildered and some of his colleagues spitefully critical. After his death in 1890 his works received the attention they deserved, but in Paris he was regarded as "a mild little organist and teacher," whose compositions were seldom played.

Roger Voisin, who will play the trumpet solo in "Quiet City," is the son of Rene Louis Voisin, who occupied the position before him in the Boston Orchestra.

Louis M. Speyer, who will play the English horn solos, was born in Paris, son of a violinist in the Cologne Orchestra. A pupil of Georges Gillet, he won first prize at the Paris Conservatory, coming to America in 1913 with a French band.

'Pique Dame' To Be Heard Next Week

Opera Scheduled At Concert Hall Monday, Tuesday

TANGLEWOOD — With a dress rehearsal for students, faculty and staff tomorrow night, performances of "Pique Dame," Tchaikovsky's opera, will be given under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, Monday and Tuesday evenings for Friends of the Berkshire Music Center whose contributions to aid the school were received early enough to secure reservations.

First produced in Russia in 1890 and in America in 1910 at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, the work is so rarely heard that it is attracting more than ordinary attention among critics, who are coming long distances to hear it.

The story is of the love of Herrmann, a poor boy, for Lisa, daughter of a Countess. To make a fortune, Herrmann tries to discover the secret of the Countess' success at cards, for which she is called "Pique Dame" (Queen of Hearts). When she refuses to tell him her secret he causes her death. This brings on his madness, during which the Countess' ghost tells him the secret of her winning at cards. Broken-hearted at her lover's insanity and supposed guilt, Lisa drowns herself, and Herrmann, with the secret of Pique Dame, wins at cards but stabs himself when the ghost reappears.

The opera is in three acts, with seven scenes in St. Petersburg, Russia about 1820. Mr. Goldovsky has translated into English the version of the opera being used at Tanglewood from the libretto written by the composer's brother, Modeste Tchaikovsky, from a story by Pushkin. The first American performance was in German, directed by Gustav Mahler.

The cast, in which the principals will appear for only one performance, includes: Herrmann, David Lloyd of Port Washington, N.Y. and Robert Price, New York; Count Tomsky, James Pease of Port Washington; Prince Yeletsky, Mac R. Morgan of Southport, Conn.; Tchekalinsky, Gene Cox of Boston; Sourin, Robert Mesrobian, Albany and James Minser, Wichita, Kan.; Tchaplitsky, Lawrence Avery, Brooklyn; Naroumov, James Joyce of Boston and Robert Rue of Detroit; Master of ceremonies, William Walker of Bloomington, Ill.; the Countess, Eunice Alberts of Andover and Edith Evans of Philadelphia; Lisa, Phyllis Curtis of Cambridge and Carolyn Long of Cambridge, Maryland; Pauline, Rosalind Elias, Lowell; The Governess, Patricia Poitras, New York; Mary, Martha Wilson, New York; Chloe, Christine Cardillo, North Adams; Daphnis, Carolyn Cameron, Pekin, Ill.; Mydas, Peter Trump, Marion Station, Pa.

Chorus, dancers and orchestra are composed of students. Mr. Goldovsky will conduct the opera, with which Dr. Koussevitzky planned to make his conducting debut in America.

MUNCH CONDUCTS 2 AMERICAN WORKS

Directs Boston Symphony in Copland and Barber Music at Berkshire Festival

By OLIN DOWNES

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 29—The week-end concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered an exceptional richness of representative symphonic music.

The concert this afternoon began with the works of two Americans who were in the audience and who have earned their spurs before this with scores that Mr. Munch interpreted. It is in no wise invidious to remark that these scores, as well as their composers, were first put before the public by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Munch read them with the utmost enthusiasm, and took obvious pleasure in their success with the audience. They were Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City." Mr. Barber's witty and amusing score has an Italianate flavor. The subject that suggested the music was Sheridan's "School for Scandal," but it could have been a comedy by Goldoni done in an Italian theatre. The piece, written in 1932, is in its nineteenth year, and sounds fresh, expert and spontaneous.

Mr. Copland has called the play by Irwin Shaw "The Quiet City," "a realistic fantasy of the many different people in a great city. "It called," he says, "for music evocative of the nostalgia and inner distress of a society profoundly aware of its own insecurity"—this was in 1939. The music, with the singularly evocative tone and color of the solo trumpet over the strings, has not lost its atmosphere. The expression of reverie is personal at the same time that the quality of the music is philosophic and tender.

Schubert Symphony Heard

The next piece was the perfectly adorable "tragic" symphony, so-called, No. 4 in the succession of Schubert's works in that form. We, ourselves, rank it highest among symphonies. To call this "tragic" is to misname the work by overstatement, as obviously the great tragic symphony of Tchaikovsky is given under-statement in nicknaming it the "Pathetic."

But Schubert's music, especially in the opening movement, is agitated, troubled, and infinitely affecting. There was no composer who sang so simply and so purely, so completely from the depths of an innocent heart. And the symphony has no weak places; even if its form and instrumentation are not those of the later works; even if, in the finale, one thinks a little of Rossini, and in the lovely slow movement of a greater model, Mozart. It is to be said that Mr. Munch called forth this music in a spirit that corresponded in its simplicity and sincerity to the composer's thought.

It was his best performance of the afternoon, for it was only here that he did not yield to overexcitement and apparently that idea that only brush-strokes can be completely successful in the big auditorium. It is neither necessary nor advisable to force tone or tempo to reach the audience of thousands inside the music shed or on the lawns outside.

Hence it was that the high spirits of the Barber overture were somewhat furiously communicated; that a greater degree of nostalgia and dream might have emanated from Mr. Copland's score, and that the dramatic and passionate performance of Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor needed a profounder majesty and a nobler dignity back of its most emotional pages.

The interpretation was, of course, effective, and wholly sincere, but it lost in poise, and therefore in the greatest effect of the climaxes. There was nervousness in it, and exaggeration, natural neither to Mr. Munch when he is completely balanced and master of the situation, nor to the nature of Franck's music.

Saturday Night's Program

The concert last night was not less interesting and perhaps better proportioned [illegible] occasion. It began with [illegible] attic "Oberon" overture [illegible] done. There followed [illegible] controversial but very [illegible] and inspired Sixth [illegible] of Prokofieff, which has [illegible] in the past to equal the [illegible] composer's Fifth in sustain[illegible] and architecture.

For whatever the impression of the moment may mean, the Sixth seemed to us last night the richer and the more significant of the two works. The first part is powerfully dramatic and the slow movement, very passionate, melodic, and introspective, too. The finale starts with the exultant and exhilarating swiftness and élan that make one of Prokofieff's characteristic moods, a mood that easily degenerates with him into the trivial. This finale sweeps along with all imaginable Cossack fire, but at the last become arrestingly tragic and portentous. The performance was exceptionally brilliant and penetrating.

There was a very fine conclusion to the concert, when Claudio Arrau appeared as soloist in the performance of Brahms B-flat piano concerto. His performance had strength that was tempered with a tone that did not harden. The same thing can be said of the ruggedness and grasp of the scherzo; the fine texture of the middle movement; the Brahms fancy and humor of the finale.

The Saturday night audience numbered 8,800 persons; that of this afternoon 9,700. This completed the first week of the Berkshire Festival symphonic concerts.

Tanglewood Russian Program Friday May Go Over 10,000-Mark

A program of Russian music, scheduled Friday evening at Tanglewood, is expected to bring this season's attendance at the student symphony orchestra concerts past the 10,000 mark, it was announced today.

This week's program will be the third in the series, and will be featured by Shastakovitch's Fifth symphony, with Leonard Bernstein conducting. Other selections on the program will include Moussorgsky's "Prelude to Khovanstchina," the first movement from Tchaikovsky's violin concerto in D major, and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

The concert is open to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music center and their

ALL TANGLEWOOD JOINS IN CONCERT

Berkshire Music Center Units Give Program in Memory of Serge Koussevitzky

By OLIN DOWNES

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 27.—The concert given tonight by members of all the departments of the Berkshire Music Center in memory of Serge Koussevitzky was an impressive illustration of the variety and scope of the work of the music which he founded and developed with his heart's blood.

The occasion opened with the performance by the chorus, conducted by John Krueger, of the Bach cantata, "O Jesus Christ, Meins Lebens Licht," and closed with Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," directed by Lorin Maazel. The classes in composition, conducting, ensemble and opera took part.

The Schubert "Trout" quintet was played by Jeanne Sandbark, violin; Anne Denton, viola; Moshe Amitray, 'cello; David Moore, double bass, and Audun Ravnan, pianist. Raymond Wilding-White directed the performance of his own "Psalm III, Motet for Women's Voices and Trombones." The piece shows strongly the Stravinsky influence, and is written with skill and conviction. Its problems of intonation and of rhythmic flexibility were excellently surmounted.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, conducted a scene from the third act of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," with Phyllis Curtin as Lisa and David Lloyd as Herman.

This opera will be performed in its entirety on stage next Monday night and can then be reported.

After the intermission, Leonard Bernstein conducted the student's orchestra in the slow movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. As with all the other performances of the evening, this one was applauded to the echo, when it would have been more fitting if silence had followed this tribute of the greatest symphonic elegie ever composed to the memory of one of the most distinguished musicians of our time.

Finally came Stravinsky's symphony of Psalms, with its singular combination of a certain hard iconlike immobility and a savage primitivism and depth of feeling fully communicated by Mr. Maazel. He penetrated to the essence of the music and conveyed it with a master hand.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

By Francis D. Perkins

LENOX, Mass., July 29.—Ample variety in period and style marked the two week-end Berkshire Festival programs played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch in Tanglewood's music shed. In last night's concert Weber's Overture to Oberon prefaced the first Tanglewood performance of Serge Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony; Claudio Arrau was the soloist in Brahm's Second Piano Concerto. This afternoon's concert began with the only two American works scheduled for this summer's festival, Samuel Barber's Overture for the School for Scandal and Aaron Copland's Quiet City. Two differently romantic symphonies, the Fourth of Schubert and Franck's only work in this form followed.

Five-figure audiences would have probably heard both concerts if the weather had been more amenable. Yesterday's weather was threatening for much of the day, and provided a drizzle during part of the concert, but the gathering of 8,800 exceeded the shed's seating capacity. Today the possibility of rain held down the attendance to some extent, but the sun appeared at intervals during the performance for the crowd of 9,700. A large contingent took advantage of the opportunity for listening informally, from the lawn.

The Weber Overture had a contrasted interpretation with notable delicacy in the introductory measures and momentum and a slightly relentless high speed for the main body of the work. The general quality of orchestral tone was delectable in the Prokofieff Symphony, but Mr. Munch's interpretation might have realized more variety of mood in the first two movements; the change of atmosphere with the onset of the finale was, however, vividly projected. The quick march in the first theme of this movement recalls similar themes in the finales of other more or less recent Russian symphonies, but this finale is distinguished by an occasionally apparent undercurrent in a grimmer vein. The general expressive purpose of this symphony, which is already known in New York, is far from hard to understand.

Mr. Arrau's warmly applauded playing of the Brahms Concerto in B Flat Major exhibited this noted pianist's well-known technical mastery, and had its ingratiating and persuasive moments. But to this listener it seemed that this work was not the happiest of mediums for Mr. Arrau, and that much of its essential atmosphere, its mellow romanticism, its expressive breadth and pervasive largeness of scale were not conveyed. He strove valiantly to realize this last characteristic, but the result was more often hard and energetic than full and sonorous. The performance as a whole sometimes suggested a laudable desire for interpretative unity rather than its actual achievement on the part of the eminent soloist and conductor.

Neither of the two American works in today's program is new. Mr. Barber composed his conservative, melodically-appealing and well scored overture nineteen years ago. Mr. Copland's Quiet City, composed in 1940, is based on theater music which he wrote a year earlier. Both works can be regarded as candidates for our not yet assembled American standard repertory. Both found the orchestra in its best form; the interpretation of the overture was expressively appropriate. In the admirably lucid performance of Quiet City there was some but not all of the atmosphere of distant brooding meditation which was associated with previous Tanglewood performances under the late Serge Koussevitzky. The soloists, Roger Voisin on the trumpet and Louis Speyer on the English horn, deserved much praise.

Schuberts Fourth Symphony, titled The Tragic, has perhaps more of wistfulness than of tragedy in its characteristic and ingratiating measures, although there is a relative darkness of mood at the beginning and at times in the andante. The orchestral tone and the clearness of medium in today's performance were laudable, but occasionally a lighter dynamic treatment might have been appropriate. Mr. Munch was expressively at home in the Franck Symphony, projected with emotional warmth and vividness of hue, which brought the first of the summer's series in the music shed to a climactic close.

Tomorrow and Tuesday nights the Berkshire Music Center's opera department presents Tchaikovsky's "Queen of Spades" in Tanglewood Theater concert hall. The Boston Symphony gives its next three concerts Thursday and Saturday nights under Mr. Munch and next Sunday afternoon under Eleazar de Carvalho. Changes have been made in both the Saturday and Sunday programs. On Saturday Mr. Munch has substituted Ravel's Second Daphnis and Chloe Suite, including a seldom-heard choral section, for Strauss' "Don Juan." On Sunday Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture and Strauss' Death and Transfiguration replace Camargo Guarnieri's Second Symphony, since the orchestral parts for the Brazilian work have not arrived. Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, with Korge Bolet as soloist, and Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition will be played as scheduled.

Concert at Tanglewood Draws Audience of 9500

Works of Only Two American Composers Listed for Three Series of Shed Programs

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, July 29 — Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony orchestra drew an audience of 9500 people to Tanglewood today for the closing concert in series A.

Two American Composers

It seems strange that in this great American institution devoted to music that only two compositions by American composers are listed for the three series of shed concerts. These two, Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal" and Copland's "The Quiet City," were played today. They have been heard here before. These two compositions do not seem to us to be as significant American music as might have been chosen for hearing at Tanglewood.

Mr. Munch gave sincere, honest interpretations to the two works. Barber's overture aims to approximate more than successful in this, if the listener happens to have a vivid imagination. Mr. Munch's reading of the score was masterful, reaching far below the surface for its meanings.

Barber Not Around

Mr. Munch looked in vain for Samuel Barber after his piece was played, but he did not appear. Mr. Copland was on hand to acknowledge the applause after his work was played.

Following the American works, there came a beautiful reading of Schubert's, "Symphony No. 4 in C Minor," familiarly known as the "Tragic." It is probable that the dark colorings of the opening movement prompted someone to give it the name "Tragic," but elsewhere it belies that nomenclature. Particularly lovely was the lyricism of the andante which Mr. Munch set forth with unabashed sentiment. After the opening movement, the work loses its gloom and the natural symphonic cheerfulness of Schubert's symphonic writings shines forth. In the stormy sections, the orchestra unleashes a torrent of tone which made for exciting listening.

Remarkable Performance

The concert closed with a remarkable performance of Franck's "Symphony in D Minor." Mr. Munch's reading was entirely personal. We felt the opening movement was brutalized, both by the brisk tempo taken and the unpleasant texture of the brasses and woodwinds. Things calmed down considerably in the [illegible] allegretto; yet, even in that there was a feeling of restlessness. The finale was a triumph for all concerned. It was a triumphant affirmation of a spirit which had reached far beyond the choir loft and which [illegible] its freedom.

Last night we listened to a splendid performance of the Brahms' "Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-flat Major" with Claudio Arrau as pianist. It was a performance shadowy in content, virile and well integrated. The final movement was tremendous in scope and spirit. Mr. Arrau has always impressed us as a "Black and White" colorist, and these colors dominated his playing of the concerto.

First Performance

Tomorrow night we shall hear the first performance of the Tschaikowsky opera "Pique Dame" under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. Koussevitzky was to have conducted this opera, making his first appearance as an opera conductor. The work has been performed but rarely in this country and interest in this, the first of two performances, is running high. Luminaries in the musical firmament are coming here in large numbers. Fritz Kreisler was present at the Saturday night concert. Gian Carlo Menotti, the composer, was here today along with the piano duo Lubushuft and Neminoff.

MOZART CONCERTS TO CONCLUDE FIRST PART OF FESTIVAL

Eight Works on Programs Next Week End at Tanglewood

Lenox, July 14—Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, music director, will perform eight works by Mozart next week end at Tanglewood, in two programs of unusual variety. With a chorus from the Berkshire Music Center, the group on Saturday evening, July 21, will present a rare Mass, the "Missa Brevis," K. 192. Soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. This work will be led by Hugh Ross. In the featured work on Sunday afternoon, July 22, William Kroll will be soloist in Mozart's violin concerto in A major.

First Performance

In addition to the Mass, Saturday's concert will include the Haffner Symphony No. 35; the Symphony in E flat, No. 39; the Adagio and Fugue for strings, K. 546; and the Serenade for string orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," K. 525. This performance of the "Missa Brevis" will be the first at the Berkshire Festival concerts.

Next Sunday afternoon's program consists of the Divertimento for strings and two horns, K. 287; the violin concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist; and the "Prague" Symphony, No. 38. These programs of music by the incomparable 18th-century master, Mozart, will conclude the series of six chamber orchestra concerts in Tanglewood's Theater-Concert Hall.

The major Berkshire Festival concerts, held in the larger Music Shed, will begin on Thursday evening, July 26, and will continue for three weeks, with concerts on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. Mr. Munch, who has been making his first appearances with his Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct all but two of the Shed concerts; the others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho.

Information concerning tickets should be addressed to the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. General admission is on sale on the day of each concert, at Tanglewood.

The opera season will open under Boris Goldovsky Tuesday with Mozart's "Impresario," Stravinsky's "Mavra" and "Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge." The Berkshire Trio will play early and modern [illegible] on chamber music Wednesday evening, as a gift of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation, and student conductors and Howard Shanet, one of their

FULL ORCHESTRA HIGHLY EFFECTIVE ON OPENING NIGHT

Mozart Funeral Music in Memory of Serge Koussevitzky

By VICTOR PRAHL

With the third concert of the major series in the large shed scheduled for this afternoon, the season at Tanglewood may be considered in full swing. We have read of a falling off in attendance at summer concerts in other parts of the country but so far this has certainly not been true of Tanglewood. The combined attendance for the concerts in the small shed has surpassed that of previous years. The coming week is another promising one and in addition to the three concerts by the full orchestra, tomorrow and Tuesday night the opera department will present Tchaikowsky's "Pique Dame".

Mozart Concerto

Of the numerous events during the past week, outstanding was the splendid performance of Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major (K. 219) by William Kroll in last Sunday's all-Mozart program. As a seasoned ensemble player, naturally it was a finely integrated performance but in addition there was an authoritative drive and at times a dash and brilliance that added up to a distinguished interpretation. We liked especially the zestful manner with which he delivered the Hungarian portion of the finale, and judging from the applause the audience did too.

Thoroughly delightful was the Divertimento in B flat major for Strings and Two Horns (K. 287) and Charles Munch made a vital, stirring work of the "Prague Symphony". He accomplished further wonders with the full orchestra on Thursday night in the Fourth Symphony by Robert Schumann and the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz. He seems to have a special gift for the musical realization of the wild dreams of Berlioz, and realistically vivid were the dramatic portions, balanced with an ingratiating light touch in the more imaginative parts. His conducting of the Franck Symphony at this afternoon's concert promises to be another event.

The concert opened fittingly with Mozart's Funeral Music (K. 477) played in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, movingly beautiful music played with a dignity and sincerity which obviously expressed the feeling of the audience as well as the players.

STUDENT CHORUS FOR RAVEL SUITE AT TANGLEWOOD

E. Power Biggs Organist in Symphony No. 3 by Saint-Saens

Lenox, July 29—Ten composers whose works spell out more than two centuries of great music will be represented in the three Berkshire Festival concerts in Tanglewood's Music Shed this week. Charles Munch, music director, will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two of these concerts, on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday afternoon, with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist on part of that program.

Thursday evening's concert will open with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," which will be followed by Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony (No. 6). These 19th-century works will be complemented by two French works of the 20th century, Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," and Roussel's third symphony.

Suite With Chorus

Saturday evening's program begins with the "Water Music" Suite by Handel, an 18th-century favorite. Bela Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion follows, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, No. 2, and Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3, with organ, will conclude the concert. The Ravel suite is to be performed with a chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross and composed of students at the Berkshire Music Center; the choral part is optional in the score, but is rarely used. The organist for the Saint-Saens work will be E. Power Biggs.

Sunday afternoon's concert will find Eleazar de Carvalho as guest conductor in a program featuring Jorge Bolet as soloist in Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 2. The remainder of the program consists of Guarnieri's second symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," with orchestration by Ravel; this orchestration to the original piano composition was made in 1922 for a Paris concert by Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Reserved seats for these concerts are available and information may be obtained at the Festival ticket office, Tanglewood. In addition, general admission to the grounds is sold on the day of each concert at the same office.

Prepare for Opera

Miss Florence Wickham, "Pauline" in first American performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" at Metropolitan, listens to rehearsal by cast who will present it at Tanglewood under direction of Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, Monday and Tuesday. Left to right: Mr. Goldovsky, Miss Wickham, Phyllis Curtin of Cambridge; Rosalind Elias, Lowell; Eunice Alberts, Andover.

Lenox, July 13—Under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, nationally-known opera expert and head of the Tanglewood opera department, students at the Berkshire Music Center next week will give two performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," or, "The Queen of Spades." Written and first produced in Russia in 1890, this melodramatic story of tragedy and mystery is regarded as one of Tchaikovsky's best works.

Its Tanglewood production, orginally scheduled to be Serge Koussevitzky's first direction of opera in America before his death June 4, will be held on Monday and Tuesday evenings, with audiences primarily composed of members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose voluntary contributions help support the work of the school, now in its ninth season. The cast includes Herrmann: David Lloyd, Port Washington, N. Y., and, on the second night, Robert Price, New York City; Lisa: Phyllis Curtin, Cambridge, Mass., and Carolyn Long, Cambridge, Md., and Chloe: Christina Cardillo, North Adams. A group of some 50 students will serve as chorus and dancers, and the orchestra is also composed of students.

Haydn Works Offered At Tanglewood

(Special to the Republican)

Lenox, Mass., July 16 —The works of Joseph Haydn, represented by four symphonies, a sinfonie concertante for winds and strings, the D major Piano Concerto and a superb interpretation of the violoncello Concerto in D major, were offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end.

The all-Haydn programs followed last week's Bach concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall. Next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon the orchestra will devote itself to music by Mozart, in the third week-end of "Little" concerts opening the 11th year of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

Gregor Piatigorsky, a rollicking, exuberant giant who came onstage swinging his cello as if it were a violin, was soloist yesterday. He drew an unprecedented burst of applause from the audience after the sustained solo passage by the cello in the exposition of the concerto, and from there on, set his own pace for Charles Munch and the orchestra to follow.

Piano soloist for Saturday night's concert was Seymour Lipkin, 24-year-old New Yorker who is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. His playing of the three-part concerto was brilliant, particularly moving in the tender, meloci second movement.

Of the four symponies offered, No. 88, No. 104 ("London,") No. 103 ("The Drum Roll,") and No. 101 ("The Clock,") the 88th was perhaps the warmest, although the tempo of the opening two movements seemed a trifle too restrained by comparison with the full, robust treatment of its minuet and final.

Visitors to Tanglewood will often find that some of the most stimulating music comes not from the professional perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but from the numberless student groups whose recitals are open to supporting members, "Friends," of the Music Center. Yesterday morning, young musicians of the orchestral department gave a program of chamber music in the open-sided Chamber Music Hall. Opera Department students list a program for tomorrow night, the student orchestra gives a Shed concert Friday, while another chamber music recital will again be given Sunday morning.

Tanglewood Report

Opening Berkshire Concerts

By Paul Giuliana

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

During the first three week ends of the Berkshire Music Center's six weeks' school and concert period, the public is invited to hear programs of fine chamber music played by first-rank musicians of one of the world's great musical organizations, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Played in the rustic Theater-Concert Hall with the naturally beautiful surroundings of the Berkshire Hills, much of the stiffness often associated with chamber compositions of compactness and excellence is dispelled, allowing the music to diffuse with more normal esthetic penetration.

An atmosphere of somber respect attended the first of the six concerts this season devoted to the works of Bach, Haydn, and Mozart, when Charles Munch conducted a revised program in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, founder of the Berkshire Music Center. In a program devoted to the chamber works of Bach it is perhaps natural that four of the Brandenburg Concerti were included.

Magnificat, Stirringly

The two concertos for three keyboards and strings as well as the secular cantata, "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus," created interest mainly because of the infrequency of their performance. A glowing peak of the Bach programs came in a devout and stirring performance of the Magnificat, sung by the Tanglewood Chorus under the direction of Hugh Ross.

High lights of the pair of concerts given over to the music of Joseph Haydn were the superlative cello playing of Gregor Piatigorsky in the Violoncello Concerto in D major, and a sparkling interpretation of the Sinfonie Concertante for Violin, Violoncello, Oboe, and Bassoon, with Richard Burgin, Samuel Mayes, Ralph Gomberg, and Raymond Allard as soloists. The remainder of the compositions were mostly long-time Haydn favorites played perennially by all symphony orchestras.

Heights of Precision

Delightful and rewarding as the masterpieces Symphony No. 88 in G major and the "Drum Roll" Symphony always prove to be, the repertory of recent Haydn discoveries would make a welcome addition to the almost too frequently played works of long-standing familiarity. Tireless labors of organizations like the Haydn Society of Boston, for example, have yielded abundant fruitage which music organizations could draw upon with broadened enjoyment for all.

It was in the three symphonies of Mozart, whose music closed the chamber series, and in the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns that Mr. Munch and the players achieved heights of precision in ensemble, polished phrasing, and delicacy of nuance. An occasional uneven passage, or one with routine interpretation in the Bach and Haydn concerts, ripened here into oneness and often into inspired interpretation. The E-flat and "Prague" Symphonies came to life, their own life, unhampered by impetuous pressure or labored emotion.

It is impossible to estimate the broadening cultural effect which festivals of music such as are held in Tanglewood have on the many thousands who attend. That listeners come great distances to hear the music is in itself significant. That the finest musicians and teachers from every branch of the art use their vacation time to further esthetic ends in a world crowded with trying problems, points to a positive presage, placing emphasis on constructive values.

Berkshires in 'My Day'

Mrs. F.D.R. Pleads for Tanglewood Support; Visits Elm Court, Reflects Tastes Improve

Today's "My Day" column by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt is printed by courtesy of United Feature Syndicate Inc., and the Boston Globe. Although The Eagle is not a subscriber to this daily article, the syndicate and its regular subscribers made it available because the content has to do solely with Berkshire County.

HYDE PARK, Sunday — On Thursday evening Miss Thompson and I went with Mrs. Auerbach from Hartford to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. It was a beautiful concert but everyone, I think, felt a little sad because our thoughts turned to Serge Koussevitzky who died on June 4, 1951. This festival was his inspiration, as was the music school and all that is done at Tanglewood.

The conductor was Charles Munch and he began the concert by playing Mozart's Masonic funeral music, asking us beforehand not to applaud but to rise and stand at the end in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky's wife came in just before the concert began and I could not help thinking what a difficult and emotional night this must have been for her. The music was beautifully rendered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and nothing could have been more fitting than this tribute to the memory of a great conductor.

Then the orchestra played Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor and after the intermission Berliaz's "Fantastic Symphony."

The French Ambassador and Madame Bonnet were there to enjoy the really beautiful rendition by the orchestra. They had come from Detroit and hoped to go for a week's holiday in Seal Harbor, Me., but Mme. Bonnet was none too sure that her husband could get six days of rest and change.

I hope the Berkshire Festival will continue to be upheld by the public because it is a fitting memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky and one that the public should continue to appreciate and support in every way possible.

Before going to the concert we dined at Elm Court, which has become an inn and restaurant. They pointed out to me the elm under which Harry White, President Woodrow Wilson and others must have discussed terms of the World War I peace treaty. I could not help thinking how much an old house could tell if only the walls and furniture could talk.

Evidently many of the furnishings and pictures were left in this house when it was sold. The grounds are the real beauty and they have been fortunate, for their elms seem to have remained untouched by the beetle.

Taste has changed since these houses of rich people were built. On the whole, I think taste has improved. There is more simplicity today regardless of the money you may have to spend. Perhaps there is less money to spend, too, and I am not sure that is not a good thing if it drives us to more stud of reral beauty of line and simplicity as well as better use of our space.

Rains Fail to Keep 8800 From Tanglewood

Shed Audience Soon Forgets Weather Under Spell of Boston Symphony's Program

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, July 28—The intermittent rains of the afternoon left the grounds here at Tanglewood too damp tonight for the usual multitude to sit outside and listen to the music but the 8800 that filled the large shed soon forgot the weather in the spirited performance of Weber's enchanting overture to "Oberon."

Charles Munch stepped out of his conservatism and resorted to a virtuoso conducting technic in this dynamic piece. He gave a special lift to music of this kind with a pronounced rhythmical character, and at his brilliant conclusion everyone was obviously in a fine mood and ready to settle down and listen to the Prokofieff "Sixth".

Although introduced in this country less than two years ago, the Boston Symphony knows this symphony well, has made it his own, and under the understanding and masterful direction of Charles Munch it was an impressive, and at times, exciting performance. The first movement sees a bit disjointed and austere but as it progresses it becomes more coherent and takes on meaning, and recognises the Prokofieff idiom.

The slow movement with its Wagnerian touches is almost operatic in its impassioned lyricism. But it is in the last movement that the composer is his own witty, ebullient self of the "Fifth" and "Peter and the Wolf". It is full of humor and all of the old Prokofieff tricks, rapid repetitious passages dressed in original harmonic sequences, clean-cut, characteristic rhythms and fantastic leaps in total intervals. With a final reminiscence of the austere first movement this remarkable work comes to an accelerated, turbulent close. The audience reacted to its varied moods and rallied with a tumultuous round of applause at its conclusion. Charles Munch was recalled numerous times inviting the members of the orchestra to arise and share the well deserved success.

As we send in these lines Claudio Arrau is just starting the Brahms Second Piano Concerto about which we shall have to report later.

Bernstein To Conduct Friday Night

Leonard Bernstein, protege of the late Serge Koussevitsky, has a major role in the musical life of the Berkshire Mountains region this year, principally as head of the orchestra and orchestral conducting department of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Friday night he will conduct the center's student orchestra in the great 6,000-seat Shed in Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 5. In the all-Russian program the other numbers will be conducted by students. Berbardo Federowski of Rio de Janeiro will conduct Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina." Tchaikovsky's Concerto in D Major will be conducted by Robert Mandell, with Armin Steiner as violinist. Lorin Maazal will conduct Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms" for orchestra and chorus, with the center chorus prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson.

These programs are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Bernstein also will conduct one of the main Berkshire Festival programs Aug. 9, a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

In neighboring Music Mountain, near Pittsfield, Bernstein will appear in an afternoon concert Aug. 6 with the Zimbler Sinfonietta as concerto pianist for the benefit of the [illegible] Cerebral Palsy Associations of Massachusetts.

Berkshire Music Students Heard—

Six Departments Combine In Koussevitzky Memorial

By Harold Rogers

Six departments of the Berkshire Music Center joined in producing an unusual concert Friday evening in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. A large audience assembled in the great Music Shed at Tanglewood to hear selections by students and faculty members who are working in the choral, chamber music, composition, opera, orchestral, and conducting classes.

The program opened with an indifferent performance, conducted by John Krueger, of Bach's Cantata No. 118, "O Jesu Christ, mein's Lebens Licht." Bach's tempo is slow, to be sure, but when buoyancy is lacking in performance, as happened in this case, sluggishness is often the result.

The concert gained instantly in interest when an ensemble of young artists gave an ingratiating reading of two movements from Schubert's "Trout" Quintet—the Theme and Variations, employing the melody of Schubert's beloved song of the same name, and the finale, Allegro giusto. This winning rendition was played by Jeanne Sandbank, violin; Anne Denton, viola; Moshe Amitay, cello; David Moore, contrabass; and Audun Ravnan, piano.

We next heard one of the high lights of the evening, a composition by Raymond Wilding-White, young Boston composer. It was "Psalm III," a motet for women's voices and a quartet of trombones. This is a difficult piece of writing, of great originality, that speaks in a contemporary idiom. Mr. Wilding-White constantly intrigues the ear with sudden contrasts in tonality, with melodies that follow no conventional pattern, with dissonant intervals that produce a harmonious effect. He often uses the trombones as a punctuating device, now bombastic, now staccato, and again in soft, sustained phrases. The trombonists gave a performance worthy of Mr. Wilding-White's brilliantly wrought motet.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, then mounted the podium to direct a concert performance of the sixth scene from the third act of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame." This opera, for which Dr. Koussevitzky was to have made his first operatic conducting appearance in America, will be heard tonight and tomorrow night in the Theater-Concert Hall. Mr. Goldovsky will conduct.

In the concert version the roles of Lisa and Hermann were given eloquent and dramatic expression by Phyllis Curtin and David Lloyd. Mr. Goldovsky was careful to keep Tchaikovsky's lush orchestration below the voices, a feat not often accomplished when a large orchestra is behind the singers on stage, rather than in the pit.

After Leonard Bernstein's poignant reading of the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica," the program concluded with a stunning performance of Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra with chorus.

The chorus, which sang with finish and dynamic response, was prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, conductor of the Chorus pro Musica in Boston. Lorin Maazel, a young conducting student of impressive ability, handled the direction of this work with surety.

Stravinsky chose the texts for his three movements from the Vulgate translation and composed the symphony in 1930 for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary and dedicated it to the orchestra. It was a fitting selection for the close of a concert in Dr. Koussevitzky's memory.

'Queen of Spades' Opera Charms at Tanglewood

Most Ambitious Work Yet Presented by Music Center Department Given Fine Performance

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, July 30—"The Queen of Spades" by Tschaikowsky was given a superior performance tonight by members of the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center here at Tanglewood. It was by far the most ambitious and demanding work the department has ever attempted and the results were entirely creditable.

Dedicated to Late Maestro

The opera was to be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and previous to the opening of Tanglewood many conferences were held and all decisions regarding the musical end of the performance were made by Dr. Koussevitzky. Boris Goldovsky told us that the opera department was dedicating this performance to the great maestro in all humility. Mr. Goldovsky conducted the performance tonight.

The opera was written and produced in Russia in 1890. The story centers about the love of Hermann, David Lloyd, for Lisa, Phyllis Curtin, daughter of the countess, Eunice Alberts. Hermann's poverty leads him to seek the countess' secret at cards which has netted her a huge fortune, but the revelation of which will cause her death.

Hermann threatens the countess, but she refuses her secret. A quarrel between Hermann and Lisa results in Hermann becoming insane, during which the ghost of the countess tells him the secret. Lisa, heartbroken at her lover's insanity, does away with herself and Hermann stabs himself at the gaming table when the countess' ghost appears. It is all very melodramatic and exciting.

Tschaikowsky lavished some of his finest music on this opera. The solo numbers, ensembles and recitatives are written in his most sensitive vein and the mounting drama is written with unparalleled skill.

The burden of the piece rests on the shoulders of Hermann, and David Lloyd gave one of his finest portrayals. The voice is somewhat light for the music, but he sung with impeccable enunciation and understated his histrionics, which was an advantage. Miss Alberts has seldom been seen to so great advantage as in the role of the countess. The Lisa of Phyllis Curtin was charmingly sung, for this young woman has a lovely voice. She did lack the temperament to put across the drama in her role. James Pease as Count Tomsky was a commanding figure and sang with big, virile tones and superb enunciation. Mac Morgan as the prince who was Lisa's fiancee gave a superb vocal delineation of the part.

One of the most charming scenes in the opera was the interlude and the pageant "The Faithful Shepherd," during which Christina Cardillo as Chloe revealed a lovely voice and fine vocalism. Carolyn Cameron as Daphnis also sang persuasively.

Charmingly Staged

This is one of the most elaborate operas to stage, according to Mr. Goldovsky. With the resources at hand, it was charmingly staged. Sets and costumes were of the century, rich in appearance and entirely functional. The many scenes were changed reasonably quickly, but it was near midnight before the opera ended.

The school orchestra played brilliantly. Mr. Goldovsky had his players well in hand, and it was seldom that they overpowered the singers. The choruses, which are delightful in themselves, were brightly sung and the stage movement was particularly well paced and organized.

The work was sung in an English translation by Goldovsky. It was an entirely singable translation and we have not before heard an operatic performance so notable for the clarity of enunciation by all concerned.

Much credit should go to all concerned in the preparation of this opera and the performance tonight was a fitting tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky, who conceived the performance and was not permitted to realize his dream of conducting it.

Berstein To Play Solo in Gershwin's 'Rhapsody in Blue' With BSO— Mrs. Roosevelt To Speak Before Concert

TANGLEWOOD — Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will share the spotlight with Charles Munch and Leonard Bernstein at the Tanglewood on Parade program here Aug. 10 for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. It will be Mrs. Roosevelt's second visit to the Festival this year.

Mr. Munch and Mr. Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the evening and Mr. Bernstein will play the piano solo in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

As in previous years, the students in the school will assemble on the "campus" and at a trumpet call will disperse to give performances of chamber music, opera, choral singing and symphonic. After an hour's interval for picnicking on the lawn or a snack at the cafeteria, Mrs. Roosevelt will speak for 10 minutes before the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays at 8.15.

As a bonus, holders of reserved and box seat tickets will be invited to a performance at 4.30 PM of Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball." The evening will conclude with dancing on the lawn.

25,400 Over Week End

Large audiences continued to pour into Tanglewood over the week end, making the total attendance for the first series of the three week-end concerts 25,400. There were 8800 at the concert Saturday night despite the rain and 9500 yesterday afternoon when rain threatened before concert time.

Big crowds also turned out aSturday afternoon for the recital by E. Power Biggs, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and yesterday morning for the chamber music concert. There will be similar performances at the same hours next week end, open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose contributions support the school.

In the week end audiences were Carlo Menotti, composer of "The Melium," "The Telephone," "The Consul," and "Amelia Goes to the Ball"; Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz (Nemenoff and Luboshutz), duo-pianists; Mrs. Lea Luboshutz, violinist at Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, mother of Boris Goldovsky, director of the Tanglewood opera department; Samued Barber, composer whose Overture, "The School for Scandal" was played at yesterday's Festival concert; Judge Raymond S. Wilkins, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Fritz Kreisler.

Also in the audience yesterday was Frieda Hempel, German soprano, who made her Metropolitan Opera debut in New York in 1912. An opera star and concert singer for many years, Miss Hempel also studied piano at the Leipzig Conservatory before becoming a vocal artist as a pupil in Berlin of Mme. Nicklas-Kempner.

Chamber Orchestra Concert

Tomorrow afternoon at 4.30 the chamber orchestra of the opera department will play in the Music Shed, led by Eleazar de Carvalho and Howard Shanet, of the conducting faculty.

Two movements from Ernst Krenek's "Kleine Blasmusik" will be given their first American performance. The program in addition will be:

Canzon Septini Toni No. 2 from Sacrae Symphoniae ..... Giovanni Gabrieli
Toccata from Il Primo Libro de Ricercari et Canzoni ..... Aurelio Bonelli
Overture from Music for the Royal Fireworks ..... Handel
Howard Shanet, conductor
Trumpet Voluntary ..... Henry Purcell
Symphonies pour instruments a vent ..... Igor Stravinsky
Apotheosis for chorus and band ..... Hector Berlioz

Ovations for Conductor Munch Show His Festival Popularity

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Charles Munch's reading of the Cesar Franck symphony yesterday afternoon brought the first week end of concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood to a rousing close. He went to extremes of tempo and to wide contrasts of dynamics to excite the huge audience to a tremendously tumultuous ovation. He brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to turbulent climaxes and then by sudden sibilant "shushes" to softer, quieters valleys to make the entire symphony one of great agitation. Anyone who thinks of the Franck symphony as representative of the kindly old composer himself would have to revise his estimate if he were to take yesterday's performance as the standard.

The program had been very intelligently devised. The concert started with two examples of contemporary American composition: Samuel Barber's overture to "The School for Scandal" and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City." Barber's overture calls for a large orchestra. In the near-20 years of its existence it had grown to be accepted as an item in the standard repertory of many orchestras. It has color, impressive thematic material and animation. The orchestra drew forth lovely sounds for Munch in this piece and at the conclusion, the conductor beckoned searchingly for the composer to stand to acknowledge the applause, but Munch seemed to have been misinformed concerning his presence. Copland, however, was there and came forward to shake Munch's hand for the way he conducted the short mood picture "Quiet City." The soloists, Roger Voisin, trumpet, and Louis Speyer, English horn, acquitted themselves superbly. Such refined wind-instrument playing is rare indeed.

Schubert's fourth symphony was a refreshing running mate to the American pieces and the French symphony. Again, Munch's choice of tempo injected elan to the music and, in the case of the 19-year-old composer, is probably more defensible. In any case in the proper places it moved along at a speed to the utmost of the virtuoso Bostonians.

Saturday Night Concert

Saturday night's program had been an equally happy sequence. Weber's "Oberon" overture was predictable by the very first sounding of the French horn's solo. The immaculate and round purity of its tone set the pace for the performance of the whole orchestra. Munch tended to exaggerate the pause and intensify the speedier passages but it all made for drama and effectiveness.

The Prokokieff sixth symphony was a first time for Tanglewood. Munch has been written about the concern of the composer's country with the products of its creative artists. This symphony, written since the end of the last war obviously conforms to the ethical dictates of those authorities. To us it was but a continuation of the music he wrote back in the "Lieutenant Kije" days, facile, glib, witty and extremely talented but without depth. Some things might require re-hearing for fuller consideration but there were few obscurities. At one point it pleases him to require the French horns to swell and subside on a single note 12 times in succession, but in the main his ease of long-line writing is not to be disputed. It is "smart" writing, it is musical epigram, pleasant and warranting admiration for its workmanship, but little of introspection. It did not seem to inspire the musician in the playing any more than it did us in the listening.

Munch closed Saturday's program with the Brahms second piano concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist. Mr. Arrau had played the Brahms first at Tanglewood five years ago and it was good to have him back for its counterpart. He confirmed the impression of mastery he made in his previous appearances, playing with conviction and dominating power. His rendition of the formidable task was essentially muscular. He put passion into Brahms's rhythmic patterns and poetry appropriately into the more tenuous lines. An added gem was the beautiful cello solo by Samuel Mayes at the beginning of the slow movement.

Mr. Munch has now run the full gamut of Tanglewood. Although he had completed two full years in Symphony Hall in Boston, he had not conducted here before this season. His three weeks with the smaller ensemble in the theatre-concert hall have now been complemented by the first of the three week ends scheduled for this series. The ovation granted him yeseterday afternoon could have left no doubt, if any still remained, concerning his acceptance. A faint smile showed through his usual dignified acknowledgements as the audience insisted on showing him their enthusiastic appreciation.

Boston Herald July 31

By RUDOLPH ELIE

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, July 30 —The opera that was to be the occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's debut as an operatic conductor was given tonight in Tanglewood —but it served instead as a memorial to him, almost a self-erected memorial. For, although he conceived and prepared every detail of the opera's production, he never lived to see it from the conductor's pit.

The opera was Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," Queen of Spades, and it was given by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. The leading roles were sung by David Lloyd, Phyllis Curtin, Eunice Alberts, James Pease, Mac Morgan, Gene Cox and Christina Cardillo—all established personalities of Goldovsky's New England Opera Theater.

RUSSIAN TALE

Narrating a singularly Russian tale of romantic melodrama mingled with melancholy, mysticism, and the idea that life is beautiful but awfully gloomy, "Pique Dame" confronts the usual star-crossed lovers with the regretable fact that the girl's grandmother has an uncanny ability to win at cards. The hero, in trying to wrest the grandmother's secret from her in order to attain wealth and position lofty enough to win the girl, causes her death. It all ends very sadly as a consequence.

Tchaikovsky, who drew his inspiration from Pushkin and was supplied with a libretto by his brother Modest, finished the opera in 1890. It failed, and after several performances by the Metropolitan as recently as 1922, dropped from the repertoire. It is not easy to see why in Goldovsky's fine English rendering, as it combines some perfectly beautiful music for both singers and orchestra with a highly emotional and, for a Russian opera, highly active drama.

Tchaikovsky is at his best here in the arias, very extended in form though never along Wagnerian lines. There are simple folk-like songs—the lovely duet of the second scene, for example—duets, choral sections, and a wide variety of standard operatic procedures. In these, with an atmosphere to evoke or a story to tell Tchaikovsky is superb. You hear echoes of the three last symphonies in the various motives, and all combine to evoke a highly charged emotional level.

Where the opera loses ground is in its recitatives; as soon as a character comes in to straighten out the plot or get characters on or off stage, the bones begin to stick through then you realize that Tchaikovsky, for all the exquisite moments he achieves, could not compose an opera all the way through, so to speak. The parts are often very great; the whole does not grow with steadily mounting intensity.

HANDSOMELY STAGED

Set in the post-Napoleonic period, the opera was handsomely staged and costumed here, and the performances were vocally and dramatic highly satisfying. David Lloyd, steadily increasing in stature, gave remarkable vocal and dramatic verity to the role of the suicidal Hermann.

Phyllis Curtin, who signs and acts with great distinction, was also outstanding. Eunice Alberts was splendidly sinister as the Queen, and James Pease, Rosalind Elias and Mac Morgan were, as always, very sound performers, and all in top voices.

The orchestra occasionally seemed a little thin, but on the whole it was highly rewarding representation. It will be repeated tonight and, it is to be hoped, given in Boston during the NEOT's regular season.

Al Fresco Symphony For Lenox

By JOAN DEAN
Detroit Times Fashion Editor

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 17—Taking on a tan while listening to a live symphony concert is all the style, eastern version.

This tan goes to the toes, too. You peel off shoes and stockings, stretch out on a cool, green lawn and let the music wash over you.

Nothing formal this, but a formula as successful as you can get (Harvey Taylor, Detroit Times music critic, please note).

This is the way thousands of people enjoy Tanglewood, in the cool and beautiful Berkshires, the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Since blouses, and not Brahms, are really our business, we had better explain that an invitation to visit Tanglewood, extended to the nation's fashion editors—now well tangled in the snarl of styles being shown in New York—was accepted 100 per cent.

Fashions En-Route

A fashion show en route gave the trip a certain legal status. While riding through the mountains, we viewed a parade of fashions for the small girl designed by Varden Petite, smart, medium-priced coats and suits by Bellciano; casual hats by Merrimac, casual costumes by Nelly De Grab, shoes by Palter DeLiso, and fabrics by Skinner.

All of these fashions, top-notch in their own fields, deserve more mention than we are going to give them at the moment. Popular with Detroiters, these styles will come in for their share of attention when they arrive in Detroit shops, which will be soon.

Being completely enchanted with Tanglewood and the charm of New England, we are at this time going to tread on the toes of the travel and food editors and move right into their fields.

About the best way to relate the trip is to have you relive it with us.

Off to the Hills

Come aboard the New Haven Railroad editors' special and roll through the eastern countryside with us. Watch the flat green fields gradually rise into foothills and then mountains. Beautiful isn't it?

Now the train is stopping at Lenox and we board horse drawn carriages for the Red Lion Inn—built in 1740. they proudly boost. But Detroit was a thriving community at that time.

There is no doubting the charm of the Red Lion Inn, however, it is as authentic an early American place as you'll ever see.

But drop that suitcase and hurry to Eastover, a converted country estate high up in the mountains where we are going to have dinner.

And what a dinner: New England in all its phases, a table filled with lobsters, baked beans and brown bread, clam chowder (made with milk, of course) and corn beef and cabbage, plus roast beef, ham, potato salad, lobster Newburg, brown Betty — oh, calories, count yourself out.

Students Gather

Now another fashion show, this time on the terrace, and then back to the Red Lion Inn for the night. And tomorrow the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood.

In this musical paradise, spread out over acres and acres of woods so thick they actually tangle, is where the "Stradivarius of orchestras"—the Boston Symphony—summes.

Here, too, come music students from all over the world, from Egypt, from Asia, and from Detroit and Michigan. We note a number: Nancy Jean Allen of Suffield Drive, Birmingham; William C. Dominik of Steel avenue, Lansing; Raymond E. Gilbert of Ewald Circle, Detroit; Kurt W. Saffir of Ilene, Detroit; and Robert L. Rue of Manistique avenue.

Detroiters on Hand

Seymour Lipkin, Detroit's musical celebrity is a member of the faculty here, too—but hush, the bell for the concert is sounding and 4,000 people pour through the gates to find any place they can.

They sit on the lawns, some in the shade with pillows under their heads, others in the sun. Some are old, some are young, all are dressed casually, even carelessly, but all are music lovers.

Some bring their lunches and munch quietly while the Boston Symphony's music flows between the hills which form a natural amphitheater.

As the concert ends, the audience quietly picks itself up from beneath the trees, some to return to one thing and some to another, and the fashion press of the nation switches from Haydn to shop interest.

Mr. Munch and Mr. Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the evening and Mr. Bernstein will play the piano solo in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

As in previous years, the students in the school will assemble on the "campus" and at a trumpet call will disperse to give performances of chamber music, opera, choral singing and symphonic. After an hour's interval for picnicking on the lawn or a snack at the cafeteria, Mrs. Roosevelt will speak for 10 minutes before the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays at 8.15.

As a bonus, holders of reserved and box seat tickets will be invited to a performance at 4.30 PM of Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball." The evening will conclude with dancing on the lawn.

25,400 Over Week End

Large audiences continued to pour into Tanglewood over the week end, making the total attendance for the first series of the three week-end concerts 25,400. There were 8800 at the concert Saturday night despite the rain and 9500 yesterday afternoon when rain threatened before concert time.

Big crowds also turned out aSturday afternoon for the recital by E. Power Biggs, organist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and yesterday morning for the chamber music concert. There will be similar performances at the same hours next week end, open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose contributions support the school.

In the week end audiences were Carlo Menotti, composer of "The Melium," "The Telephone," "The Consul," and "Amelia Goes to the Ball"; Mr. and Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz (Nemenoff and Luboshutz), duo-pianists; Mrs. Lea Luboshuiz, violinist at Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, mother of Boris Goldovsky, director of the Tanglewood opera department; Samued Barber, composer whose Overture, "The School for Scandal" was played at yesterday's Festival concert; Judge Raymond S. Wilkins, trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Fritz Kreisler.

Also in the audience yesterday was Frieda Hempel, German soprano, who made her Metropolitan Opera debut in New York in 1912. An opera star and concert singer for many years, Miss Hempel also studied piano at the Leipzig Conservatory before becoming a vocal artist as a pupil in Berlin of Mme. Nicklas-Kempner.

Chamber Orchestra Concert

Tomorrow afternoon at 4.30 the chamber orchestra of the opera department will play in the Music Shed, led by Eleazar de Carvalho and Howard Shanet, of the conducting faculty.

Two movements from Ernst Krenek's "Kleine Blasmusik" will be given their first American performance. The program in addition will be:

Canzon Septini Toni No. 2 from Sacrae Symphoniae ..... Giovanni Gabrieli
Toccata from Il Primo Libro de Ricercari et Canzoni ..... Aurelio Bonelli
Overture from Music for the Royal Fireworks ..... Handel
Howard Shanet, conductor
Trumpet Voluntary ..... Henry Purcell

Ovations for Conductor Munch Show His Festival Popularity

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Charles Munch's reading of the Cesar Franck symphony yesterday afternoon brought the first week end of concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood to a rousing close. He went to extremes of tempo and to wide contrasts of dynamics to excite the huge audience to a tremendously tumultuous ovation. He brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to turbulent climaxes and then by sudden sibilant "shushes" to softer, quieters valleys to make the entire symphony one of great agitation. Anyone who thinks of the Franck symphony as representative of the kindly old composer himself would have to revise his estimate if he were to take yesterday's performance as the standard.

The program had been very intelligently devised. The concert started with two examples of contemporary American composition: Samuel Barber's overture to "The School for Scandal" and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City." Barber's overture calls for a large orchestra. In the near-20 years of its existence it had grown to be accepted as an item in the standard repertory of many orchestras. It has color, impressive thematic material and animation. The orchestra drew forth lovely sounds for Munch in this piece and at the conclusion, the conductor beckoned searchingly for the composer to stand to acknowledge the applause, but Munch seemed to have been misinformed concerning his presence. Copland, however, was there and came forward to shake Munch's hand for the way he conducted the short mood picture "Quiet City." The soloists, Roger Voisin, trumpet and Louis Speyer, English horn, acquitted themselves superbly. Such refined wind-instrument playing is rare indeed.

Schubert's fourth symphony was a refreshing running mate to the American pieces and the French symphony. Again, Munch's choice of tempo injected elan to the music and, in the case of the 19-year-old composer, is probably more defensible. In any case in the proper places it moved along at a speed to the utmost of the virtuoso Bostonians.

Saturday Night Concert

Saturday night's program had been an equally happy sequence. Weber's "Oberon" overture was predictable by the very first sounding of the French horn's solo. The tone set the pace for the performance of the whole orchestra. Munch tended to exaggerate the pauses and intensify the speedier passages but it all made for drama and effectiveness.

The Prokokieff sixth symphony was a first time for Tanglewood. Munch has been written about the concern of the composer's country with the products of its creative artists. This symphony, written since the end of the last war obviously conforms to the ethical dictates of those authorities. To us, it was but a continuation of the music he wrote back in the "Lieutenant Kije" days, facile, glib, witty and extremely talented but without depth. Some things might require re-hearing for fuller consideration but there were few obscurities. At one point it pleases him to require the French horns to swell and subside on a single note 12 times in succession, but in the main his ease of long-line writing is not to be disputed. It is "smart" writing, it is musical epigrams, pleasant and warranting admiration for its workmanship, but little of introspection. It did not seem to inspire the musician in the playing any more than it did us in the listening.

Munch closed Saturday's program with the Brahms second piano concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist. Mr. Arrau had played the Brahms first at Tanglewood five years ago and it was good to have him back for its counterpart. He confirmed the impression of mastery he made in his previous appearances, playing with conviction and dominating power. His rendition of the formidable task was essentially muscular. He put passion into Brahms's rhythmic patterns and poetry appropriately into the more tenuous lines. An added gem was the beautiful cello solo by Samuel Mayes at the beginning of the slow movement.

Mr. Munch has now run the full gamut of Tanglewood. Although he had completed two full years in Symphony Hall in Boston, he had not conducted here before this season. His three weeks with the smaller ensemble in the theatre-concert hall have now been complemented by the first of the three week ends scheduled for this series. The ovation granted him yesterday afternoon could have left no doubt, if any still remained, concerning his acceptance. A faint smile showed through his usual dignified acknowledgements as the audience insisted on showing him their enthusiastic appreciation.

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, July 30 —The opera that was to be the occasion of Serge Koussevitzky's debut as an operatic conductor was given tonight in Tanglewood —but it served instead as a memorial to him, almost a self-erected memorial. For, although he conceived and prepared every detail of the opera's production, he never lived to see it from the conductor's pit.

The opera was Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," Queen of Spades, and it was given by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. The leading roles were sung by David Lloyd, Phyllis Curtin, Eunice Alberts, James Pease, Mac Morgan, Gene Cox and Christina Cardillo—all established personalities of Goldovsky's New England Opera Theater.

RUSSIAN TALE

Narrating a singularly Russian tale of romantic melodrama mingled with melancholy, mysticism, and the idea that life is beautiful but awfully gloomy, "Pique Dame" confronts the usual star-crossed lovers with the regretable fact that the girl's grandmother has an uncanny ability to win at cards. The hero, in trying to wrest the grandmother's secret from her in order to attain wealth and position lofty enough to win the girl, causes her death. It all ends very sadly as a consequence.

Tchaikovsky, who drew his inspiration from Pushkin and was supplied with a libretto by his brother Modest, finished the opera in 1890. It failed, and after several performances by the Metropolitan as recently as 1922, dropped from the repertoire. It is not easy to see why in Goldovsky's fine English rendering, as it combines some perfectly beautiful music for both singers and orchestra with a highly emotional and, for a Russian opera, highly active drama.

Tchaikovsky is at his best here in the arias, very extended in form though never along Wagnerian lines. There are simple folk-like songs—the lovely duet of the second scene, for example—duets, choral sections, and a wide variety of standard operatic procedures. In these, with an atmosphere to evoke or a story to tell Tchaikovsky is superb. You hear echoes of the three last symphonies in the various motives, and all combine to evoke a highly charged emotional level.

Where the opera loses ground is in its recitatives; as soon as a character comes in to straighten out the plot or get characters on or off stage, the bones begin to stick through then you realize that Tchaikovsky, for all the exquisite moments he achieves, could not compose an opera all the way through, so to speak. The parts are often very great; the whole does not grow with steadily mounting intensity.

HANDSOMELY STAGED

Set in the post-Napoleonic period, the opera was handsomely staged and costumed here, and the performances were vocally and dramatic highly satisfying. David Lloyd, steadily increasing in stature, gave remarkable vocal and dramatic verity to the role of the suicidal Hermann.

Phyllis Curtin, who signs and acts with great distinction, was also outstanding. Eunice Alberts was splendidly sinister as the Queen, and James Pease, Rosalind Elias and Mac Morgan were, as always, very sound performers, and all in top voices.

The orchestra occasionally seemed a little thin, but on the whole it was highly rewarding representation. It will be repeated tonight and, it is to be hoped, given in Boston during the NEOT's regular season.

50 From All Parts of Nation See Models Parade at Lenox Resort

Lenox, July 15 — These Berkshire Hills were paid a whirlwind visit over the week end by 50 fashion editors. Boarding tally hos which are heavily laden with the romantic history of old society which once reigned supreme here, the editors were given a real country ride to Eastover.

Excellent Meal

The guests were treated to a sumptuous supper. Once settled down the fashion editors reclined in easy lawn chairs, doffed hats and shoes and watched the fashions as exhibited by New York models.

Practically every section of the country was represented by the fashion editors and one wondered if they did not leave the Eastover wonderland with more thoughts of the variety and quality of the meal laid before them than they did of the clothing that adorned the models.

One editor who has covered fashion shows in all the fashion centers o[illegible] Europe and the United States was heard to remark that "this is it." She never thought that she would be seated barefooted, wiggling her toes in the cool of the evening amidst flashing floodlights and a galaxy of colors topped by a brilliant moon that danced on the blue waters of Eastover's pool to cover a fashion show.

Visit Tanglewood

The group motored to Tanglewood where it joined the record throng to enjoy the Haydn program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

During intermission the editors interviewed students from their particular sectors of the country who are enrolled in the Berkshire Music School.

It is unlikely that the visiting writers gleaned much from the fashion attire of the overflow crowd on the lawn unless they were looking strictly for informal wear.

In Spite of Inefficiencies

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "The Queen of Spades," this season's first offering of the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center, was given on Monday evening before a full house in the theater-concert hall of Tanglewood. Based on Pushkin's famous story of love and gambling and perfidy and the supernatural, and set to passionate and insistent music by Russia's most celebrated composer, this score is one of the finest blueprints in the repertory for producing in the musical theater an abundance of atmosphere and excitement.

Nevertheless, atmosphere, excitement, all the dramatic intensities that seem to inhere in it, are seldom present in its performance. I do not know why this work so seldom makes its effect. Neither can I quite explain how so much of that effect came to life on Monday evening, far more, indeed, than this reviewer has ever formerly experienced. The performance was far from first-class by professional standards. There were musical and dramatic faults without number. And yet the piece made its impression, carried its message to a grateful audience.

The production's first virtue was an English translation that told the story plainly and violated nothing in the vocal line. Its second was the clear enunciation of that text by the singing actors. Its third was sound vocalism on the part of these same actors, particularly those who sang the leading roles—Phyllis Curtin, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, Mac Morgan and James Pease. Secondary advantages appeared in the scenery and costume design, which were ambitious and generally successful, if not in any notable way distinguished.

The weakest element of the production was, surprisingly, its musical direction. Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is an opera leader of considerable experience. And yet his orchestra (students, I admit, but not incompetents, by any means) lacked balance, blending and correctness of pitch. Its tempos lacked vigor, his accompaniments, in many cases, discretion. There must have been more virtue in his work than this reviewer observed, for the performance did have some dramatic power. Its lack of grace on the stage, save in the principle parts (for American vocal students are notoriously sloppy of stance and movement), was neither surprising nor gravely harmful. But nonobservance of the orchestral amenities and general lack of both delicacy and drive in the musical direction might well have failed altogether to animate so complex a score and spectacle.

That no such failure took place must be credited to Mr. Goldovsky, in spite of his orchestral ineptitudes and unsubtle pacing. For the show was his. He had translated it, coached it and staged it in rehearsal, as he conducted it in performance. It did not sound well, except for some of the singing; but it looked well and came over clearly both as music and as drama. This last feat, a difficult one and rarely achieved with "The Queen of Spades," merits note and gratitude. For the opera has dramatic power in it and untold musical wealth. Any one, I should think, would have been glad to make, as this reviewer did on Monday after many years, its real acquaintance.

AUS DER MUSIKWELT

Von FRED LOW

Erstes Konzert der Berkshire Festspiele

(Sonderbericht für die "New Yorker Staats-Zeitung und Herold")

LENOX, 28. Juli. — Charles Munch dirigierte das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in Tanglewood Donnerstag abend. Er eröffnete das Programm mit der "Maurerischen Trauermusik" Mozarts zum Gedenken an den kürzlich verstorbenen Direktor der Berkshire Festspiele, Serge Koussevitzky. Zu Beginn richtete Munch eine kurze Ansprache an das Publikum und ersuchte, von Beifallskundgebungen nach dem Mozart-Werk im Hinblick auf den feierlichen Charakter abzusehen und sich zu einer Trauerminute von den Sitzen zu erheben.

Die "Maurerische Trauermusik" wurde von Mozart im Juli 1785 zum Gedenken an zwei Freimaurer, Herzog Georg August von Mecklenburg-Strelitz und Franz Graf Eszterhazy von Galantha geschrieben; die Komposition ist ein einfaches Werk mit klingenden Streicherchören und getragenen Melodien. —

Munch erreichte mit der Wiedergabe der Symphonie Nr. 4 D-Moll von Robert Schumann den Höhepunkt des Abends, die Interpretation brachte den romantischen Charakter des Werkes zu allerschönster Geltung, der Streicherklang war bezaubernd und selbst in den zartesten Nuancen bis in den entferntesten Platz der großen Halle und des Rasengeländes hörbar. Der Dirigent zeigte in der Ausarbeitung der Themen, in der Durchführung und im Aufbau der Steigerung des ersten Satzes die sorgfältige Probenarbeit. Die Einheitlichkeit des Spiels der Geigen in den Sechzehntelpassagen, die Cellokantilene in der Romanze von der Oboe sekundiert, die delikate Pizzicatobegleitung der Melodie, die Stelle der Sologeige die zum ersten Thema zurückführt, werden in der Wiedergabe des hervorragenden Orchesters zu einem großen Genuß für den Hörer. Im Scherzo kommt der straffe Rhythmus zum Vorschein und im Finale, das vom Trio des vorhergehenden Satzes eingeleitet wird, kommen nochmals die unübertrefflichen Geiger zu bester Wirkung.

Der Abend wurde mit einer Aufführung der Symphonie Fantastique von Berlioz abgeschlossen; man kennt die Interpretation des französischen Dirigenten aus früheren Konzerten der Bostoner. Charles Munch gibt dem Werk eine Spannung, die im ersten Satz, im "Marches des supplices" und im Hexensabbath zu großartigen Steigerungen führt. Im Schlußsatz verwendet er volltönende Glocken im Gegensatz zu den sonst gespielten Instrumenten, der Kontrast des Klanges zu dem der Streicher ist unvergleichlich. Der Walzer und der Pastoralsatz sind prachtvoll abgestuft, die Tempi werden vom Dirigenten manchmal rascher als sonst genommen, die Wirkung auf den Hörer ist dadurch noch gesteigert.

Es war eine Meisterleistung Munchs, die er allerdings nur mit einem solchen Ensemble vollbringen konnte. Jede Regung, jede Geste des Dirigenten wird genauestens befolgt; wir hatten Gelegenheit, Proben beizuwohnen und zu konstatieren, daß trotz Beibehaltung der großen Linie die einzelnen Nuancen doch immer wieder geändert sind, ein Zeichen der niemals vollkommen gleichbleibenden Stimmung des Dirigenten.

Das Konzert am Donnerstag war ein vielversprechender Auftakt zu den Festwochen in Tanglewood, die in bezug auf Qualität des Orchesters und seines Dirigenten kaum eine Konkurrenz zu befürchten haben. Über die Programmwahl im allgemeinen und die Durchführung der Feste in Tanglewood wird allerdings nach manches zu sagen sein.

Freitag abend fand in der großen Halle ein Gedenkkonzert für Serge Koussevitzky statt, es war eine ausgezeichnete Idee, die Ausführung den Studierenden zu übertragen und dadurch die Bedeutung des ehemaligen Leiters des Berkshire Music Center durch seine Studenten würdigen zu lassen. Alle Klassen des Berkshire Music Center beteiligten sich an dem Konzert, das eine Übersicht über die Tätigkeit der einzelnen Abteilungen ermöglichte. Ursprünglich war ein Konzert des Studentenorchesters, das allwöchentlich in der großen Halle für die "Freunde des Music Centers" spielt, geplant. Die Chorklassen unter Leitung von Hugh Ross brachten eine Aufführung der Bach Kantata Nr. 116, Dirigent John Krueger, Knoxville, Tenn.

Jeanne Sandbank (Geige) von Boston, Anne Denton (Viola), Binghampton, N. Y., Moshe Amitay (Cello) Israel, David Moore (Kontrabaß), Chicago, und Audun Ravnan (Klavier), Granville, Ohio vereinigten sich zum Quintett in 2 Sätzen aus Schuberts Forellenquintett. In der Kompositionsklasse hörte man Psalm III, Motette für Frauenchor und vier Posaunen von Raymond Wilding-White (Dirigent: der Komponist) und Boris Goldovsky leitete die Konzertaufführung einer Szene aus Tschaikowskys Oper "Pique Dame". Das Werk wird Montag und Dienstag im Theatre-Saal zur szenischen Aufführung gelangen. Schließlich wurde Strawinskys "Psalmensymphonie" vom Studentenorchester unter Leitung Iorin Maazels, Pittsburgh aufgeführt, der mitwirkende Chor wurde in den Proben von Alfred Nash Patterson dirigiert. Zum Abschluß der Veranstaltung leitete Leonard Bernstein den Trauermarsch aus der "Eroica" Beethovens.

Die Leistungen der Studenten erreichten in allen Vorträgen ein anerkanntes Niveau, ein Zeichen für die Arbeit, die in den einzelnen Klassen geleistet wird. Die Gedanken der Mitwirkenden und der Hörer waren auf den Gründer des Berkshire Music Center gerichtet; Serge Koussevitzky hat sich mit der tatkräftigen Hilfe, die er begabten Musikern und insbesonders jungen Komponisten gewährt hatte, große Verdienste erworben. Er hat vielen bisher unbekannten Talenten erst die Durchführung ihrer Pläne, die Verfolgung ihrer künstlerischen Laufbahn ermöglicht. Die Musikwelt hat mit dem Tode des Dirigenten einen großen Verlust erlitten, die jungen Studenten haben in ihm noch weit mehr verloren.

Die Festwochen in Tanglewood bringen diese Woche die Erstaufführungen der Oper "Pique Dame" von Tschaikowsky, Boris Goldowsky ist für die musikalische und szenerische Leitung verantwortlich, Kammermusikkonzerte, eine Veranstaltung des "Composer Forum" sowie Konzerte des Boston Symphonie Orchesters Donnerstag und Samstag unter Leitung Charles Munchs, und Sonntag nachmittags, Dirigent Eleazar de Carvalho, ergänzen das Programm der Veranstaltungen. Ferner sind Konzerte eines Kammerchors Freitag, 3. August, nachmittags, des Studentenorchesters, Freitag abend vorgesehen, für die "Freunde des Berkshire Music Center" ist der Besuch der Orchesterproben unter Munch und Carvalho ermöglicht. Die Festwochen in Tanglewood werden bis 12. August fortgesetzt.

"Pique Dame" und "Ariadne auf Naxos" bei den Festspielen in Tanglewood

Von FRED LOW

Serge Koussevitzky beabsichtigte Tschaikowskys Oper "Pique Dame" im Rahmen der Berkshire Festspiele aufzuführen, er wollte das Werk dirigieren und Boris Goldovsky war für die Leitung der Szene bestimmt. Nach dem Ableben Koussevitzkys wurde Goldovsky zum verantwortlichen Leiter der Opernklassen ernannt und als zweites Werk der Saison Richard Strauß "Ariadne auf Naxos" zur Wiedergabe gewählt.

Zehn Opern sind im Verzeichnis der Kompositionen des russischen Meisters enthalten, doch nur zwei Werke "Pique Dame" und "Eugene Onegin" kommen heute noch, wenn auch sehr selten, zur Aufführung. "Pique Dame" ist 1890 geschrieben worden, das Libretto wurde von Modest Tschaikowsky, dem Bruder des Komponisten verfaßt, es war ursprünglich für N. S. Klenovsky bestimmt, der sich aber nach langem Zögern entschloß das Buch abzulehnen. Tschaikowsky wollte vorerst ein Libretto, das von einem Andern als nicht gut genug bezeichnet wurde, ebenfalls ablehnen, er schreibt in einem Brief: ein Buch wie "Pique Dame" inspiriert mich nicht im mindesten und ich könnte niemals etwas wertvolles daraus machen." Zwei Jahre später änderte er allerdings seine Meinung, als der Direktor des Kaiserlichen Theaters zu ihm kam und die Komposition einer Oper anregte, die er in der Saison 1890 aufführen wollte. Tschaikiwsky entschloß sich nach Florenz abzureisen, "dem einzigen ruhigen und friedvollen Platz in der Welt" wie er in einem Brief an einen seiner Freunde schreibt. Er vollendete das Werk im Juni 1890, war aber von der konzentrierten Arbeit so erschöpft, daß er die Niederschrift oft unterbrechen mußte. Heimweh nach Rußland zeigt sich auch in seinen Briefen aus dieser Zeit: "Die Arbeit ging sogleich gut vonstatten, aber in meinen Mußestunden litt ich so sehr unter dem Heimweh, daß ich weinte wie ein Kind und oft alles im Stich lassen und nach Hause reisen wollte." In diesem Brief, der an den Großfürsten Konstantin gerichtet war, liest man auch von einer "Zerrüttung der Nerven, die fast zu einer Krankheit ausartete", von "Widerwillen gegen Florenz" und von "der Freude an der bevorstehenden Heimkehr." Tschaikowsky meint, daß es sehr leicht möglich sei, daß "Pique Dame" eine herzlich schlechte Oper ist, die er nach einem Jahr hassen wird aber "für jetzt scheint mir, daß dies mein bestes Werk ist und daß ich in der Art eine Tat vollbracht habe." Das Libretto ist nach einer Dichtung Puschkins geschrieben, bei aller Unwirksamkeit des Inhalts ist der Text doch geschickt verfaßt; es ist ein wahrer Schauerroman in dessen Mittelpunkt die Figur eines Offiziers steht, der vom Kartenspiel unwiderstehlich angezogen, niemals über die nötigen Mittel zum Spiel verfügt, eine Liebesgeschichte ist in die Handlung verwoben. Die gespenstische alte Gräfin, die Hüterin des Geheimnisses der "drei gewinnenden Karten" wird ermordet und die Oper endet mit dem Tod des Offiziers und seiner Braut. Obgleich Modest Tschaikowsky für das Libretto verantwortlich war, hatte der Komponist seinen großen Anteil an dem Buch. Im Originalmanuskript sieht man die Wörte des Textes auf der rechten Seite geschrieben, die Anmerkungen des Komponisten und die Verbesserungen sind auf der linken Seite zu lesen. Tschaikowsky, der immer der Verwendung von Motiven abgeneigt war und sich oft gegen Richard Wagner aus diesem Grunde ausgesprochen hatte, macht in "Pique Dame" von einem Hauptmotiv Gebrauch, das durch die ganze Oper zu hören ist. Es ist das Motiv der "drei Karten: Drei, Sieben und As." Die Szene im Schlafraum der alten Komtesse ist voll Spannung in der Musik, die Instrumentierung zeigt den hervorragenden Meister des Orchesters. Einfache Lieder, ein wirkungsvolles Duett (Lisa und Polina) und die Arie Tomskys sind Höhepunkte der Oper, auch die Romanze, eine reizvolle Melodie im zweiten Akt und die berühmte Arie Hermanns im Finale sowie die große Szene Lisas waren für den großen Erfolg des Werkes bestimmend. Die Premiere fand am 19. Dezember 1890 in St. Petersburg statt, Aufführungen in Wien 1902), in Rom (1906), in Berlin (1907) und in New York (1908) bestätigten den Erfolg. Es war schon seit langem die Lieblingsidee Serge Koussevitzkys gewesen die Schönheiten der Oper Tschaikowsky dem Publikum der Berkshire-Festspiele zugänglich zu machen, er hatte alle Einzelheiten der Besetzung und Aufführung mit Boris Goldovsky festgelegt und die Leiter des Berkshire "Music Center" haben es daher als eine pietätvolle Pflicht angesehen den Willen Koussevitzkys unverändert durchzuführen.

Boris Goldovsky hat als zweites Werk die Oper Richard Strauß' "Ariadne auf Naxos" zur Aufführung vorbereitet. Für die "Ariadne" sind nur 36 Musiker erforderlich, ein Kammerorchester, in dem jeder solistisch tätig und das Klavier hervorragend beschäftigt ist. Das Werk wurde vor zwei Jahren im City Center aufgeführt, es gehört zweifellos zu den hervorragendsten Schaffungen des deutschen Meisterkomponisten und wird unbegreiflicherweise in Amerika nur selten gegeben. Über die Entstehung der Oper erfährt man aus dem Briefwechsel Strauß - Hofmannsthal interessante Einzelheiten, die für die Bühnenaufführung wesentliche Hinweise geben. Hofmannsthal schreibt: "Es handelt sich um ein simples und ungeheures Lebensproblem: Das der Treue. An dem Verlorenen festhalten, ewig beharren bis an den Tod — oder leben, weiterleben, hinwegkommen, sich verwandeln, die Einheit der Seele preisgeben und dennoch in der Verwandlung sich bewahren, ein Mensch bleiben, nicht zum gedächtnislosen Tier herabsinken —." Das Gegenüberstellen der Figur der Ariadne zu der Tänzerin und Komödiantin Zerbinetta kommt in der Musik zu hervorragender Charakteristik. — Die Gestalten der Commedia dell'arte Harlekin und Scaramuccio, das Spiel im Spiel, die heroisch-mythologischen Figuren im Kostüm des 18. Jahrhunderts geben eine Mischung, die Richard Strauß zu seiner Komposition inspirierte und in der er im intimen Rahmen etwas Einmaliges geschaffen hat. Die erste Fassung der Oper 1912 in Stuttgart brachte dem Dichter und dem Komponisten einen außerordentlichen Erfolg, Max Reinhardt war für die Szene verantwortlich. 1916 entschlossen sich Strauß und Hofmannsthal eine Umänderung vorzunehmen, die Molieresche Komödie wurde von der Oper separiert und die neue Fassung,

Stirring Program At Tanglewood

(Special to The Republican)

Lenox, Mass., July 27—Diplomatic and musical notables attracted almost as much attention as did the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday [illegible] the Berkshire Music Festival's major summer concerts in the vast Tanglewood Shed.

It was more than merely a celebrity-studded opening night, however, for an audience of more than 7,000 heard a stirring performance of the imaginative "Fantastic Symphony" by Berlioz, long to be remembered by admirers of Charles Munch, new conductor of the orchestra. The violent contrasts in the Berlios music were heightened by Mr. Munch's orchestration, which brought out all the color, fire and grisly humor of this symphony.

The program, first in a series of nine Festival concerts for the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened with the resonant Masonic Funeral Music by Mozart. Dedicating this to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, founder of [illegible] director and conductor [illegible] orchestra for a quarter-century, Mr. Munch asked the listeners not to applaud, but to stand in tribute at the finish of the number. Thursday would have been Dr. Koussevitsky's 77th birthday.

Also played was Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, a vigorous, melodic composition which then took the orchestra in swift transition from sensitive airs for strings to the brassy insistance of a triumphant finale.

Thursday night's audience included Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt; the French ambassador, Henri Bonnet, and his stately wife; Mme. Koussevitsky, dramatically clad in a long black cape; and the young composer-conductor, Leonard Bernstein, long a protege of Koussevitsky, who now directs the Music Center School.

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Even in Europe the late Serge Koussevitzky was not much given to operatic conducting and this country never heard him in that capacity. His long [illegible] was to have been broken [illegible] summer in a pair of performances at Tanglewood of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame." Last fall he [illegible] Boris Goldovsky discussed the [illegible] ject at length, deciding on [illegible] matters as cuts, which were to be negligible, and the period of the opera, which was to be moved from the [illegible] of Catherine the Great down to 1820, at about which time Pushkin wrote the Hoffmannesque short story on which the opera is based.

But we all know what happens to the best laid plans. Koussevitzky's failing health caused a temporary postponement of the projected performances until 1952, but when death overtook him in early June it was decided to mount the opera as a memorial to him. "Pique Dame," which Tanglewood heard and Boston will hear next winter as "The Queen of Spades," was apparently dear to Koussevitzky. He had planned a concert performance of it at Symphony Hall but the war made impossible the visits of the Russian singers upon whom he had counted.

* * *

Like the New England Opera Theatre's performance of "Eugene Onegin" last season, the Tanglewood showings of "The Queen of Spades," which took place on Monday and Tuesday of last week, raised the issue of the operatic Tchaikovsky and the disparity that exists between the enormous popularity of his orchestral works and the scanty American hearings of his pieces for the stage, of which there are 10 in all. "Pique Dame," to give it the title by which it is commonly known, has always enjoyed enormous vogue in Russia and apparently most Russians regard it as Tchaikovsky's operatic masterpiece, while in other parts of the world that position is generally accorded "Onegin."

* * *

Having now heard both works in the course of half a year, I am prepared to say that "Onegin" is the finer of the two; that it is better integrated; that there is a closer relation between the music and the story; that it is of finer grain and stylistically more unified. "Pique Dame," on the other hand, is richer in the sort of thing that appeals to the ordinary opera-goer. In fact, it would seem to be the one of Tchaikovsky's operas that has the most in common with the operas of Western Europe. One of my New York colleagues suggested at the Monday evening premiere that with the inclusion of spoken dialogue it would make it a hit on Broadway.

In advance of Puccini, Tchaikovsky worked out a compromise between the vocal opera of the Italians and the symphonic one of Wagner. The orchestra has plenty to do in "Onegin" and even more in "Pique Dame," which came along a dozen years later, that is to say in 1890, three years before the composer's death. A bang-up orchestral performance would be something to hear, and perhaps Koussevitzky could have brought it to pass with the excellent student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center. These youngsters did well for Mr. Goldovsky the other evening, giving you a very good idea of the potentialities of the score. That they had made their first acquaintance with their parts less than a week before, is proof of their ability, even if it does bespeak a certain crowding of the Tanglewood schedule.

* * *

As briefly stated here the other day, the Pushkin story, and the libretto by the composer's brother, Modest, which elaborates upon it and departs from it in certain respects, is concerned with a young officer, Hermann, who tries to wrest from an aged countess the secret of her infallible success at cards, and inadvertently scares her to death in the attempt. Later her ghost confides it to him, but when he is to play the ace, that fateful card inexplicably becomes the Queen of Spades. He loses all and stabs himself. There is a love affair between Hermann and Lisa, the countess' granddaughter, though when the latter finds that Hermann is more interested in money than in her, she drowns herself.

Up to the second scene of Act II, when Hermann secretes himself in the countess' bedroom, the music seems merely laid on to the story. In that scene, however, it immediately grips the hearer, and until the end that grip is seldom relaxed. The actual conclusion is nevertheless musically weak. The cheerful songs of the gambling officers seem out of key with the tragedy that had come before, and Tchaikovsky found no very convincing musical expression for Hermann's self destruction.

In the matter of settings and costumes this was the most elaborate production that Tanglewood has seen. As in all Goldovsky performances, the dramatic side was well taken care of, and for the most part the singing was of a high order as well. On Monday David Lloyd distinguished himself as Hermann; Phyllis Curtin made an appealing Lisa, even if she could not do fullest justice to the music; Eunice Alberts projected the aged countess admirably; and the fine baritone of James Pease was heard to excellent advantage in the music of Count Tomsky, a vocally rewarding role. It would be a pleasure to mention all 13 members of the cast, did space permit, and even that would not include Christina Cardillo, Carolyn Cameron and Peter Trump who participated in the classic Interlude, to music in the style of Mozart, that interrupts the ball scene at the beginning of the second act. That we are to have "Pique Dame" at the Opera House next season is good news indeed. By it our collective operatic experience will be enriched.

Erstes Konzert der Berkshire Festspiele

(Sonderbericht für die "New Yorker Staats-Zeitung und Herold")

LENOX, 28. Juli. — Charles Munch dirigierte das erste Konzert des Bostoner Symphonieorchesters in Tanglewood Donnerstag abend. Er eröffnete das Programm mit der "Maurerischen Trauermusik" Mozarts zum Gedenken an den kürzlich verstorbenen Direktor der Berkshire Festspiele, Serge Koussevitzky. Zu Beginn richtete Munch eine kurze Ansprache an das Publikum und ersuchte, von Beifallskundgebungen nach dem Mozart-Werk im Hinblick auf den feierlichen Charakter abzusehen und sich zu einer Trauerminute von den Sitzen zu erheben.

Die "Maurerische Trauermusik" wurde von Mozart im Juli 1785 zum Gedenken an zwei Freimaurer, Herzog Georg August von Mecklenburg-Strelitz und Franz Graf Eszterhazy von Galantha geschrieben; die Komposition ist ein einfaches Werk mit klingenden Streicherchören und getragenen Melodien. —

Munch erreichte mit der Wiedergabe der Symphonie Nr. 4 D-Moll von Robert Schumann den Höhepunkt des Abends, die Interpretation brachte den romantischen Charakter des Werkes zu allerschönster Geltung, der Streicherklang war bezaubernd und selbst in den zartesten Nuancen bis in den entferntesten Platz der großen Halle und des Rasengeländes hörbar. Der Dirigent zeigte in der Ausarbeitung der Themen, in der Durchführung und im Aufbau der Steigerung des ersten Satzes die sorgfältige Probenarbeit. Die Einheitlichkeit des Spiels der Geigen in den Sechzehntelpassagen, die Cellokantilene in der Romanze von der Oboe sekundiert, die delikate Pizzicatobegleitung der Melodie, die Stelle der Sologeige die zum ersten Thema zurückführt, werden in der Wiedergabe des hervorragenden Orchesters zu einem großen Genuß für den Hörer. Im Scherzo kommt der straffe Rhythmus zum Vorschein und im Finale, das vom Trio des vorhergehenden Satzes eingeleitet wird, kommen nochmals die unübertrefflichen Geiger zu bester Wirkung.

Der Abend wurde mit einer Aufführung der Symphonie Fantastique von Berlioz abgeschlossen; man kennt die Interpretation des französischen Dirigenten aus früheren Konzerten der Bostoner. Charles Munch gibt dem Werk eine Spannung, die im ersten Satz, im "Marches des supplices" und im Hexensabbath zu großartigen Steigerungen führt. Im Schlußsatz verwendet er volltönende Glocken im Gegensatz zu den sonst gespielten Instrumenten, der Kontrast des Klanges zu dem der Streicher ist unvergleichlich. Der Walzer und der Pastoralsatz sind prachtvoll abgestuft, die Tempi werden vom Dirigenten manchmal rascher als sonst genommen, die Wirkung auf den Hörer ist dadurch noch gesteigert.

Es war eine Meisterleistung Munchs, die er allerdings nur mit einem solchen Ensemble vollbringen konnte. Jede Regung, jede Geste des Dirigenten wird genauestens befolgt; wir hatten Gelegenheit, Proben beizuwohnen und zu konstatieren, daß trotz Beibehaltung der großen Linie die einzelnen Nuancen doch immer wieder geändert sind, ein Zeichen der niemals vollkommen gleichbleibenden Stimmung des Dirigenten.

Das Konzert am Donnerstag war ein vielversprechender Auftakt zu den Festwochen in Tanglewood, die in bezug auf Qualität des Orchesters und seines Dirigenten kaum eine Konkurrenz zu befürchten haben. Über die Programmwahl im allgemeinen und die Durchführung der Feste in Tanglewood wird allerdings noch manches zu sagen sein.

Freitag abend fand in der großen Halle ein Gedenkkonzert für Serge Koussevitzky statt, es war eine ausgezeichnete Idee, die Ausführung den Studierenden zu übertragen und dadurch die Bedeutung des ehemaligen Leiters des Berkshire Music Center durch seine Studenten würdigen zu lassen. Alle Klassen des Berkshire Music Center beteiligten sich an dem Konzert, das eine Übersicht über die Tätigkeit der einzelnen Abteilungen ermöglichte. Ursprünglich war ein Konzert des Studentenorchesters, das allwöchentlich in der großen Halle für die "Freunde des Music Centers" spielt, geplant. Die Chorklassen unter Leitung von Hugh Ross brachten eine Aufführung der Bach Kantata Nr. 116, Dirigent John Krueger, Knoxville, Tenn.

Jeanne Sandbank (Geige) von Boston, Anne Denton (Viola), Binghampton, N. Y., Moshe Amitay (Cello) Israel, David Moore (Kontrabaß), Chicago, und Audun Ravnan (Klavier), Granville, Ohio vereinigten sich zum Quintett in 2 Sätzen aus Schuberts Forellenquintett. In der Kompositionsklasse hörte man Psalm III, Motette für Frauenchor und vier Posaunen von Raymond Wilding-White (Dirigent: der Komponist) und Boris Goldovsky leitete die Konzertaufführung einer Szene aus Tschaikowskys Oper "Pique Dame". Das Werk wird Montag und Dienstag im Theatersaal zur szenischen Aufführung gelangen. Schließlich wurde Strawinskys "Psalmensymphonie" vom Studentenorchester unter Leitung Iorin Maazels, Pittsburgh aufgeführt, der mitwirkende Chor wurde in den Proben von Alfred Nash Patterson dirigiert. Zum Abschluß der Veranstaltung leitete Leonard Bernstein den Trauermarsch aus der "Eroica" Beethovens.

Die Leistungen der Studenten erreichten in allen Vorträgen ein ansehnliches Niveau, ein Zeichen für die Arbeit, die in den einzelnen Klassen geleistet wird. Tuneful Recess From Styles

Shins Sunburned at Tanglewood

By DOROTHY PARNELL
Sentinel Women's Editor

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., July 16—Sunburned shins from listening to a symphony concert is a strange complaint.

But that's what we're suffering from Monday as we prepare to return to New York after spending Sunday at Tanglewood, the Berkshire music center created by the late Serge Koussevitzky.

We never expect to see a more colorful sight than the thousands of people gathered on the lawns and meadows . . . nor do we ever hope to find as beautiful a scene.

Magnificent trees—elms, pines and birches—rising high seemingly to protect acres of formal gardens, count on the mountains beyond as backdrop.

The thrill of listening to Haydn's symphony No. 103, with Charles Munch conducting and Gregor Piatigorsky as honor guest, lying on the grass under a warm summer sky is something we'll never forget, and we won't soon forget the sunburn, either.

In the morning people start gathering on the grounds of Tanglewood, which consist of 210 acres extending from Lenox to the shores of Lake Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. It was laid out in 1849 by a Boston banker. Music festivals were first held on the estate in 1934, and in 1936 Tanglewood was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the owner. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in the first concert that year in August.

And in 1940 Dr. Koussevitzky realized his long dream for the establishment of a school of music, and a place where people could meet and enjoy great music informally.

The appeal of music as a universal language brings a colorful audience, not only to the shed, where the orchestras are seated, but sprinkling the lawns for a great distance beyond.

You see young and old arriving with their box lunches, blankets and pillows, hours before the concert starts. Looking over the grounds from the shed, it resembles pictures we've often seen of Coney Island on a hot summer day—this a cultural Coney Island, of course. The women wear costumes of bras and shorts or slacks, or smart cotton frocks, and even handsome silk afternoon clothes. Limousines drive up with New England dowagers and teenagers, arm in arm, carry cameras and bottles of soft drinks.

A PERFECT DAY FOR THE OCCASION

Sunday was a perfect day, a good lazy day to sit in the magnificent gardens, listen to the music and watch the old and young. More fun to watch the young with romance in their hearts as they listened to the soft airs.

But then we had business to attend to, we wanted to find Wisconsin students fortunate enough to take part in the six-week period of music study. There are four Wisconsin men here.

Frank J. Italiano of La Crosse, formerly of Waukesha; Jack Hohensee, N. 47th St., Milwaukee; Achilles Balabanis, of South Milwaukee, and Lawrence Bocaner, of Wisconsin Rapids.

They tell us great things of Italiano, who is studying conducting. A handsome, brown-eyed man of 35, his wife and three children make their home in La Crosse where Mrs. Italiano is running a tea room.

This young man, a graduate of Carroll College, has studied during summers at the University of Wisconsin and at the Cincinnati Conservatory. He is in the music department of the La Crosse schools. During World War II made his bow as a conductor with the Shanghai Municipal Orchestra.

He wonders why, after his session here, where the finest musicians in the world teach, he will not have his work recognized with credits toward his schooling.

AIM IS TO PLAY IN SYMPHONY

Bocaner, 20, whose parents are Mr. and Mrs. Bory Bocaner, hopes to be a symphony clarinetist. He has been studying since he was 10. He has had two years [illegible] School of Music, has attended summer sessions at our state university, and has played with the Chicago Civic Orchestra.

He was considered tops at an audition held in Chicago by directors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his entrance here.

Young Hohensee, 19, whose parents are the Herman Hohensees, N. 47th St., graduated from Washington High School where he played in the school orchestra and was a member of the All-City Orchestra, as was Achilles Balabanis, who is 20 years old. They speak highly of the All-City Orchestra as well as the music departments in the high schools but, though of tender years, both the boys feel Milwaukee is backward in not having its own symphony orchestra. They point out cities of much smaller size which have their own orchestras.

They add, somewhat bitterly: "If we ever do have our own orchestra, we're afraid outside people will be brought in. Do you think Milwaukee musicians will be taken in if we ever have an orchestra?"

Hohensee has a scholarship at Arizona State College at Tempe, Ariz. He is studying the bassoon and conducting. He has played with the Phoenix symphony orchestra. He, too, has studied music at the summer sessions at the University of Wisconsin.

'LUCKIEST PEOPLE IN THE WORLD'

Achilles' parents are Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Balabinis of South Milwaukee. He is a cellist and is studying at the University of Wichita, where he has spent the last two years. A graduate of South Milwaukee High School, he played in their orchestra and it was through the efforts of Leona Marek, a former teacher at his school that he was given the four year music scholarship at Wichita.

All four consider themselves the luckiest people in the world that they are able to attend Tanglewood.

Back to the Red Lion Inn for dinner, following the concert and a last look at the antique-filled hostelry that is 171 years old.

And these are not just a few antiques, in the Ye Olde Tea Shop manner, but magnificent collections that would do honor to any museum. Here it is that Longfellow and Nathaniel Hawthorne spent much of their time.

Hawthorne's little red cottage on the Tanglewood estate where he wrote "Tanglewood Tales" and "The House of Seven Gables" was burned down in 1890. Several years ago a replica was built on the original site and presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the National Federation of Music Clubs for use as studios by the Berkshire Music Center.

Yes, we had a fine dinner and we got a kick out of the framed words of William Makepeace Thackeray that hangs on the wall of a hall in the inn, above a table where Thackeray had eaten many a meal. It reads:

"Sir, respect your dinner; idolize it, enjoy it properly. You will then be many hours in the week, many weeks in the year, and many years in your life the happier if you do.

"Don't tell me that it is not worthy of man. All a man's senses are worthy of enjoyment, and should be cultivated as a duty. The senses are the arts. You like your dinner, man, never be ashamed to say so. If you don't like your victuals, pass on to the next article; but remember that every man who has been worth a fig in his world, poet, painter or musician, has had a good appetite and a good taste."

SOCIETY: Bostonians Sponsor Famous Tanglewood Concerts

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Combining the best the Wintertime musical season has to offer and the pleasures of a long-famous country resort sounds like wishful thinking, but it is a well organized reality at Tanglewood, thanks to the late Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both music lovers who are extremely serious about their concert fare and Berkshire colonists, interested in all the "extras" offered in the course of the annual festival, are taken into consideration when the six-week session is planned.

Bostonians have made a sizable contingent in the audience and student body ever since the Berkshire Music Center was established nine years ago. Gifts from friends of the Center make it possible for talented students from all over the world to work with a faculty of able musicians, who are performers as well as professors. Fields covered include orchestral, chamber, operatic, and choral music, as well as composition and theory.

Benefits are scheduled as well as regular concerts, such as the chamber music sessions that offered Bach on July 7 and 8, Haydn on July 14 and 15, and Mozart on July 21 and 22 this year, and concerts by the full orchestra in the shed on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons from July 26 through Aug. 12.

"Tanglewood on Parade," on Aug. 10, will be an all-day, all-evening benefit, with dancing on the green, picnics and prizes to mark the day, and on Saturday, Aug. 11, there is to be a public rehearsal in the shed at 10:30 by members of the full orchestra for the benefit of its pension fund.

Heading the long list of sponsors and box-holders for the 1951 concert series at Tanglewood are Mrs. Francis B. Crowninshield, due to arrive at Lenox from Marblehead; Mrs. Allan Forbes, who will be going up to the Berkshires from "Broadfield" in Weston; Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, who is at Marion; the Carl A. Weyerhaeusers, the Edward Tafts, and Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, who spends the major part of the Summer at Little Boar's Head, Rye Beach, N. H.

Music Appreciation Programs Proving Popular in Schools

LENOX — Music appreciation programs designed to give children a broader perspective on life are being instituted in many schools throughout the state, a distinguished music educator told members of the Lenox Kiwanis Club last night. He is Augustus D. Zanzig, associate professor of music at Harvard and teacher at the Brookline High School, here for the summer as director of musical education at Tanglewood.

In a short talk at the weekly Kiwanis Club dinner at the Curtis Hotel, Mr. Zanzig said that many schools are making it possible for students to learn music in hope the training will enlarge their intellectual and social scope.

At Brookline, as elsewhere, he said, there is a shortage of young string instrumentalists. Many music education programs offer free instruction on these instruments to school children. For the more advanced, low-cost, private lessons are arranged, Mr. Zanzig said.

Aside from a basic knowledge of music, these programs are intended to give the student a sense of achievement, Mr. Zanzig declared. And because music is an interest which deepens as life goes on, school training programs will also help fit the individual into a place in society, the Kiwanians learned.

Stressing the part music plays with the individual, Mr. Zanzig said that people who perform for the fun of it create an entirely different manner from those who are forced to perform at set times, namely concert musicians. Chamber musicians, said Mr. Zanzig, also find particular pleasure in playing for themselves.

Koussevitzky's Cousin to Take Action On Will

Dedham, Mass., Aug. 3 (AP)—Fabien Sevitzky, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra and a nephew of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, noted Boston symphony conductor who died June 4, filed an appearance against his uncle's will in Norfolk County Probate Court today.

Dr. Koussevitzky's will, drawn on May 15, made no provision for Sevitzky, who was listed as an "heir at law," the declaration said.

Koussevitzky's widow, Olga, was the only heir to his will.

Other listed heirs not provided for were two nephews, Joseph and Boris Koussevitzky, and a niece, Sophia Koussevitzky, whose "whereabouts are unknown."

Notes and Footnotes

IF YOU'VE never obeyed an impulse you haven't lived. After Sunday's Tanglewood concert while plowing through discarded newspapers on the lawn we spied the theatrical section of the New York Herald Tribune. We rescued it thriftily, tucked it under our arm to read at home, and there discovered written on the margin in French: "Quelle numero a telephone, a Brooklyn?" The answer was "Shirley Eisenberg, DI 6-9013."

Containing our curiosity until night rates yesterday, we phoned Shirley, and we must say she was astonished, and for a time very skeptical. But once she got the idea, she was co-operative in the extreme. We learned rapidly she's age 22, lives at 257 New Lots Avenue, Brooklyn, and this was her first visit to Tanglewood. She spent a week in Lenox at the Azabach Country Inn, and enjoyed it so much she may come back for the final series.

She's a C.C.N.Y. graduate, loves music, and says people tell her she doesn't talk Brooklynese. Quite often she attends the Lewisohn musical programs, but feels that's not like Tanglewood by a long shot. "You get a different effect," she confided, "lying on the lawn and listening. At Lewisohn there's no lawn." She soon felt at home here, as she was forever running into ex-classmates.

Now, about that phone number on the Tribune. It's a personal matter, and the chap who copied it on a card hadn't called by the time we did. "He will, though," she predicted confidently. "It takes a little time."

If she returns to Tanglewood, Shirley's going to look us up. We'd like to see what she looks like. Over the phone, she's okay.

Festival Gouging

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

I was intrigued by your front page article last Wednesday to the effect that visitors are spending less time in the Berkshires. It is a sad commentary on the greed of humans, who withhold their inn accommodations from the two or three-day vacationers in the hopes of catching bigger bait!

A resident of La Crosse, Wis., I am making my first Berkshire visit. I sense that rates go up especially for tourists. Of course a little of that sort of thing might be expected, but with the extent of the "gouging" that appears prevalent, it won't be long before the Berkshires will get even fewer of the two-three day tourists. One wonders how they get by OPS regulations.

It seems to me that too many Berkshire innkeepers are forgetting that there are many other places in America offering comparable scenic and social advantages and that they must induce them more by true hospitality.

I dare say that if some inn were to keep its rates reasonable and advertise them as being reasonable, that people would beat a path to their door—and for longer stays.

It seems as though the Golden Rule has been altered to "Do unto others—first." If so, let them suffer the consequences and not cry to the public on the front page.

Tuneful Recess From Styles

Shins Sunburned at Tanglewood

By DOROTHY PARNELL
Sentinel Women's Editor

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., July 16—Sunburned shins from listening to a symphony concert is a strange complaint.

But that's what we're suffering from Monday as we prepare to return to New York after spending Sunday at Tanglewood, the Berkshire music center created by the late Serge Koussevitzky.

We never expect to see a more colorful sight than the thousands of people gathered on the lawns and meadows . . . nor do we ever hope to find as beautiful a scene.

Magnificent trees—elms, pines and birches—rising high seemingly to protect acres of formal gardens, count on the mountains beyond as backdrop.

The thrill of listening to Haydn's symphony No. 103, with Charles Munch conducting and Gregor Piatigorsky as honor guest, lying on the grass under a warm summer sky is something we'll never forget, and we won't soon forget the sunburn, either.

In the morning people start gathering on the grounds of Tanglewood, which consist of 210 acres extending from Lenox to the shores of Lake Mahkeenac in Stockbridge. It was laid out in 1849 by a Boston banker. Music festivals were first held on the estate in 1934, and in 1936 Tanglewood was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by the owner. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in the first concert that year in August.

And in 1940 Dr. Koussevitzky realized his long dream for the establishment of a school of music, and a place where people could meet and enjoy great music informally.

The appeal of music as a universal language brings a colorful audience, not only to the shed, where the orchestras are seated, but sprinkling the lawns for a great distance beyond.

You see young and old arriving with their box lunches, blankets and pillows, hours before the concert starts. Looking over the grounds from the shed, it resembles pictures we've often seen of Coney Island on a hot summer day—this a cultural Coney Island, of course. The women wear costumes of bras and shorts or slacks, or smart cotton frocks, and even handsome silk afternoon clothes. Limousines drive up with New England dowagers and teenagers, arm in arm, carry cameras and bottles of soft drinks.

A PERFECT DAY FOR THE OCCASION

Sunday was a perfect day, a good lazy day to sit in the magnificent gardens, listen to the music and watch the old and young. More fun to watch the young with romance in their hearts as they listened to the soft airs.

But then we had business to attend to, we wanted to find Wisconsin students fortunate enough to take part in the six-week period of music study. There are four Wisconsin men here.

Frank J. Italiano of La Crosse, formerly of Waukesha; Jack Hohensee, N. 47th St., Milwaukee; Achilles Balabanis, of South Milwaukee, and Lawrence Bocaner, of Wisconsin Rapids.

They tell us great things of Italiano, who is studying conducting. A handsome, brown-eyed man of 35, his wife and three children make their home in La Crosse where Mrs. Italiano is running a tea room.

This young man, a graduate of Carroll College, has studied during summers at the University of Wisconsin and at the Cincinnati Conservatory. He is in the music department of the La Crosse schools. During World War II made his bow as a conductor with the Shanghai Municipal Orchestra.

Opera

Music Center Students Score Big Triumph in 'Pique Dame'

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—One of Serge Koussevitzky's most cherished hopes, it appears, was his desire to conduct Tchaikovsky's opera "Pique Dame" in America. When he scheduled it last winter for performance this summer at the Berkshire Music Center, it was to have been his first conducting of opera in all his 27 years in this country. Although he was deprived of the fulfillment of his ambition in this particular instance, the opera was produced last night at Tanglewood "basically," according to Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department of the Center, "exactly as he planned it when we went to consult him at Tucson last spring."

The performance, which will be repeated tonight, was such a definite success that praise without stint should immediately be accorded Mr. Goldovsky and all the assisting members of the Center opera faculty. There are details which in other circumstances we might expect to see improved and expedited, but for sheer enjoyment no one in the crowded theatre minded what in a better equipped house might have been obviated.

Pushkin's story demands a bit of credulity but Tchaikovsky's music, played with live spirit by an orchestra in the pit from the students of the school, is rich and imaginative. The seven sets were handsomely devised. The waits to change them might have annoyed a less cordially-inclined audience, but few protested the after-12 final curtain as against the pleasure the opera as play and as music afforded.

The overture and the short orchestral preludes introducing most scenes are distinctly Tchaikovsky at his best moments. The history of the opera's production in this country shows it to have been only rarely staged and at long intervals, but, from every reference to Russian operatic history since the year of its conception, "Pique Dame" has been not only the most often played but has become something the composer's compatriots treasure with a possessive fondness excluding all others from enjoying or understanding to the same degree. Be that as it may, few present last night would have conceded, granted the conditions and the bare three-week preparation, that this performance suffered by comparison.

The swiftest synopsis would tell of a young officer's cupidity for money beyond the other two driving forces, according to Pushkin, of love and fame, which motivate men's lives and the possession of a mystic formula for luck at cards possessed by an aged countess whose daughter, conveniently, is lovely beyond words. Last night Hermann, the young officer, was David Lloyd, tonight it will be Robert Price; the young ladies, in the same interchange of roles, are Phyllis Curtin and Carolyn Long; the Countess Eunice Alberts and Edith Evans. The other parts to be retained on both nights are James Pease as the count, Mac Morgan as the prince, Rosalind Elias as Lisa's friend, and, in supporting roles, Gene Cox, Robert Mesrobian, Robert Rue, Lawrence Avery, Patricia Poitras, Martha Wilson, William Walker, Robert Minser, James Joyce, Christian Cardillo, Carolyn Cameron and Peter Trump.

The cast last night had been excellently trained. There were few errors so far as stage direction goes; vocally it was very often an all-out triumph. David Lloyd was not consistently fervent but there were so many oportunities that he grasped with complete satisfaction, especially as he neared the close of the opera, that only his best scenes will be retained in our memory. The closing ones; on the river bank, and last, in the gambling room, were stunning in their impact. Lloyd and Miss Curtin sang with moving penetration in the lugubrious suicide scene and in the brilliant gaming room a double trio octet ranged from a barrack room ballad to the dramatic and tragic curtain with Lloyd stirring us as though the gaudy regimental uniforms were not unreal.

Miss Alberts portrayed the countess so realistically and fearsomely that we wish she might have shown herself at one final curtain as her own personable self rather than the ogre-like make-up and costume she wore all evening. The role of the count suited James Pease to perfection both vocally and in swaggering stature.

Tchaikovsky has put action in the music. By simple and obvious musical idioms he created drama and tension and passion and built climaxes which Mr. Goldovsky in the pit summoned with enthusiasm and a sympathy for the subject matter which a less able conductor in his field would have passed over.

Plouffe

GOING TO THE BALL: Count Tomsky (James Pease), assists the countess (Edith Evans) down the steps on their way to the masked ball in a scene from "Pique Dame," Tchaikovsky's opera, given last night at Tanglewood. It will be repeated tonight for reserved seat ticket-holders of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Appeal Issued For Co-operation On Opera Tickets

TANGLEWOOD — Friends of the Berkshire Music Center for whom tickets are being held for this evening's performance of "Pique Dame," are requested to telephone the Friends' office if they are unable to use them.

Because of the failure of 34 persons to call for tickets at last night's performance, about 100 seats were vacant until after the first act. In order that people on the waiting list may be admitted, the management today appealed to Friends unable to make the trip to Tanglewood either tonight or for "Ariadne" next week, to advise the office.

MRS. ROOSEVELT AT TANGLEWOOD

Will Speak at Benefit for Music Center Aug. 10

Lenox, Aug. 1—Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak and four conductors will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra for "Tanglewood on Parade," the annual benefit for the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, that will be held Aug. 10.

Evening Concert Stars

At the evening concert Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will conduct Debussy's Three Orchestral Sketches, "The Sea": "From Dawn to Noon on the Sea," "Play of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea." Leonard Bernstein will conduct and play the solo part in George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" for Piano and Orchestra. The program will open with Berlioz "Overture, Benvenuto Cellini," Eleazar De Carvalho conducting, followed by Bloch's "Nigun, for Violin and Orchestra," Ruth Posselt playing the solo and Richard Burgin conducting.

From 6 p. m. the school will be on view. At the call of a trumpet the audience may hear an hour of opera in the theatre-concert hall, a symphony concert in the music shed, a choral concert in the shell in the orchard or chamber music in the chamber music hall. One may choose his favorite form of music. After an interval for a picnic on the lawn or a snack at the canteen the evening's program will begin, with Mrs. Roosevelt speaking for 10 minutes following the first half.

As a bonus, those holding tickets for the front section and the boxes will be invited to a special performance of Menotti's operetta, "Amelia Goes to the Ball." The evening will conclude, as in previous years, with waltzing on the lawn. Tickets are on sale at the box office, Tanglewood. All proceeds will be applied to the support of the school.

Munch in Brilliant Performance

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Special to The Hartford Times

LENOX, Mass.—When some 10,000 people get together to hear a concert they are themselves an instrument—a part of the orchestral apparatus. It is like the viol d'amore which has strings to be played upon like any other fiddle and another set which are not touched but which vibrate in sympathy with the tones uttered.

Every conductor, regardless of the angle of approach to his art, knows this as basic, a happy spheric harmony between the natural laws of God and man's make-up. Doubtless he gets a thrill to see the principle so perfectly exampled as at Tanglewood. This is the present experience of Charles Munch who last night conducted his first concert in the big music shed under typical circumstances—a packed pavilion seating more than 6,000 and a large encampment on the clipped lawns between the pine rows, all these in extremes of informality and correctness as to dress but universally respectful and musically resonant.

There was more humidity than is usual of a Berkshire evening and an occasional murmur from thunderheads on the horizon but starry overhead.

THE REST of Munch's orchestral apparatus was oddly chosen—extremes, again, among creative genius, Schumann whose diction was never truly symphonic and Berlioz whose orchestral speech was intuitive and flame-tipped.

My preference for the Schumann symphonies has always been, in the order of their composition, first the effervescent "Spring" symphony, the C major, the tapestried "Rhenisch" and lastly the one played last night. It may be only a private fancy that Schumann wrote spontaneously in B flat, brilliantly in C, gracefully in E flat, and with energy but cerebrally in the key of D minor.

Munch found that the composition has heart rather than head and the energy was of the primordeal sort that heaves up out of the good earth, the stuff that volcanoes and violets are made of. He is not the one to calculate effect for effect's sake, but many a conductor would have envied him the sheer virtuosity of the performance. Its secret lay in his ability to give Schumann orchestral voice, whether in the gossamer of the connecting passages or the explosive climaxes of the peroration.

IT IS NOT difficult to see why conductors elect to play the Symphonie Fantastique. There is an easy and implicit success in the electrifying "March to the Scaffold" and the following "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath." But these are merely tempting circumstances in a composition which, in spite of its historical greatness, has its enigmas and consumes the better part of an hour in the playing.

Now Munch is this kind of conductor. Not himself magnetic, he magnetizes the music. You are compelled to listen to it. It has been said recently that listeners are not to be disturbed if they find their attention wandering during a concert, because music is oftentimes provocative of utterly foreign thoughts and that is a part of the enjoyment of escape.

I fancy Munch doesn't put up with that nonsense. He is determined that music shall have something to say. Every note of the longish "Scene in the Meadows" was engrossing and of musical importance; and the same may be said for the first movement in which one is inclined to wonder why Berlioz who was the master of the entire orchestra, and yearned for a bigger one, could at times employ so little of it.

The waltz movement containing as it does on its final pages some of the most transporting cadences in all music, was completely enchanting. The blood-chilling "March" and the lurid finale, both sulphurous with sounds of hell that have never even been imitated drew nerves to a pitch that found release in a torrential demonstration by a spent audience. Munch's Symphonie Fantastique was the most brilliant orchestral performance I have ever heard.

THE PROGRAM began with a performance of Mozart's lugubrious Masonic Funeral Music in memory of Koussevitzky, at the close of which the audience stood in silent tribute to the man who created Tanglewood.

STRAUSS OPERA TO BE GIVEN AT TANGLEWOOD

Berkshire Music Center Event Tomorrow, Tuesday

Lenox, Aug. 4—For its second major production of the 1951 season, the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center will present Richard Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos, Monday and Tuesday evenings, Aug. 6 and 7. Last week, the opera department presented Tchaikovsky's Pique Dame, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, head of the department. The Strauss production will be conducted by Miss Sarah Caldwell, with staging by Mr. Goldovsky and Miss Caldwell.

The libretto is by Hugo von Hoffmannsthal, and the Tanglewood production will be given in English. Between the usual prologue and the opera itself, there will be a spoken interlude based on Moliere's Bourgeois Gentilhomme, and especially written for this performance by Eugene Haun, of Philadelphia, a student here.

The Boston Symphony in the Berkshires -

Festival Coverage

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

George Judd has sent me clippings from The Eagle which show the coverage which you have made of the concerts and doings at Tanglewood. As chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, I want to thank you very sincerely for the magnificent way you have told the story of this year's concerts. This was a critical year for us but I think we have come along very well. Munch, to my mind, is a first rate conductor and certainly the members of the orchestra are playing their hearts out for him.

Munch in First Appearance At Tanglewood Shed Concerts

By Harold Rogers

The main series of the Berkshire Festival got off to an auspicious start last week end when Charles Munch appeared for the first time at Tanglewood with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra. Even though the players are familiar with the repertoire, having played most of it in Boston last winter, Mr. Munch apparently brooks no summer letdown and holds the orchestra to its highest standards. The group as a result is giving some of its finest alfresco performances.

While a late Saturday afternoon shower discouraged many listeners from sitting on the lawn under the sky, the Shed was sold out. So at least 6,000 people had assembled to hear Mr. Munch conduct Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Prokofiev's Sixth Symphony, and the Brahms Piano Concerto No. 2 in B-flat major. Claudio Arrau was the soloist.

The tuneful Prokofiev Sixth, introduced to Boston last winter, is an easy symphony to get hold of. One finds that the themes are appealing on first hearing, and that after three or four performances one even recalls their entrances, developments, and recapitulations.

Also with added hearings the deep-toned sobriety that underlies the obstensibly trivial treatment becomes increasingly evident. The impassioned outcry at the close of the final Vivace movement, which at first might seem unrelated to what has gone before, becomes more and more logical, like a gigantic bubble that works its way upward throuh a ferment to burst on the surface.

The plaintive lament of the first movement and the agonized progressions of the Largo were interpreted by Mr. Munch with great depth of emotion. He took the opening of the last movement too fast, however; the violins lost their clarity.

Mr. Arrau's performance of the Brahms was close to perfection, as was Mr. Munch's sensitive orchestral accompaniment. In the first two and fourth movements Mr. Arrau showed that side of his musical personality that is sparkling, brittle, and astonishing. But in the third movement, the Andante, we heard the Arrau of the recital hall—the poet of emotional eloquence, the artist who is able to let the music sing from his heart. The wild ovation that ensued was eminently deserved.

On Sunday afternoon the excellent weather encouraged about 9,700 listeners to visit Tanglewood. They heard Mr. Munch conduct Samuel Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal"; Aaron Copland's "Quiet City"; Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony, No. 4; and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

The vivacious Barber overture was brought off with scintillating effect. In Copland's "Quiet City" the trumpet and English horn have a colloquy that holds the stage from beginning to end. Mr. Copland, it is said, prefers the open trumpet at the beginning and the muted trumpet when the theme is restated at the conclusion. Mr. Munch, it is said, prefers the muted trumpet at the beginning. Mr. Munch, of course, bowed to Mr. Copland's wishes in this performance.

This is one of those cases where the conductor's choice appears preferable to the composer's, but Roger Voisin's trumpeting was of that caliber that should have pleased both. He and Louis Speyer, who played the English horn, were brought forward several times for applause. Mr. Copland was in the audience, as was Mr. Barber, and he personally congratulated the conductor and performers. Mr. Barber, however, was not to be seen when Mr. Munch called for him.

Perhaps Mr. Munch made Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony a little more tragic than it really is. The first two movements are solemn, it is true, but they don't wear a very long face. The short Menuetto abandons the suggestion of mourning, and the final Allegro skims along in a jolly, breezy, forthright way.

Mr. Munch closed with his rejuvenated version of the old Franck D minor. He tightens it up, infuses it with vigorous energy, and it moves without dallying right up to its closing chords. Thus the first series ended. Two more are scheduled.

Tschaikowsky Opera Staged at Tanglewood

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Special to The Hartford Times

LENOX, MASS.—Tanglewood last night staged an opera which Serge Koussevitsky planned, talked about for a year, and all but executed.

He was to have conducted Pique Dame but that duty fell to Boris Goldovsky, who told how he and Koussevitsky, in Arizona and in Brookline, had discussed the production down to the last detail. There were to be such changes only as Koussevitsky deemed restorative of Tschaikowsky's intentions. The composer "had been forced to listen to people who knew nothing but whom he was not in a position to refute."

The music was to be uncut except for parts of the long promenade scene in Act I and some of the spectacle opera composed especially for the imperial ballet.

This explanation was made by Mr. Goldovsky before the opening curtain in a talk dedicating the production to Koussevitsky's memory. He apologized for limited facilities and unavoidably long delays between the many scene changes which would have challenged the resources of a permanent opera company.

These sets were beautiful and elaborate, the work of G. Philippe de Rosier, the handsome costuming by Leo van Witsen. The performance required four full hours of elapsed time, ending at 12:15 a.m. This was due to the problem of handling seven complete changes of setting, creating technical demands greater perhaps than any similar opera workshop has ever faced.

GIVEN A DECOR, of magnificence, splendid voices and a teeming, variegated and dramatically articulate score do you have great opera? Not necessarily. There is still to be added an element which, for want of a better term, may be called operatic truth. In places the lack could have been remedied by better direction. You cannot create a great actress but a beautiful woman can be led about the stage plausibly. The music of genius, on the other hand, cannot be reshaped and if action has not been suited to the note there isn't much you can do about it. Tschikowsky wrote sterling music for this work but he was not stage canny and at times you could not be sure that he was entirely convinced of the reality of the dramatic business.

The opera, "The Queen of Spades," was done in English, a most serviceable translation by Mr. Goldovsky. Most of the dialog was easily followed, but it made a difference who was singing. James Pease, for instance, was superbly understandable in the narrative of the Queen of Spades in the first act. Phyllis Curtin, on the other hand, might as well have been singing in Russian a good deal of the time. It was only in her gripping and grandly sung last scene that she came over into the vernacular satisfactorily.

The story concerns Hermann, a young officer, hopelessly in love with the nobly born Lisa, whose grandmother, the Countess, is the supposed possessor of the secret of a card sequence which made her wealthy. Hermann steals into Lisa's apartment and wins her love but he is soon torn between love and cupidity. Seeking to force the aged Countess's secret he invades her bed chamber and when he threatens her with an unloaded pistol she dies of fright. During the funeral her ghost imparts the card secret to Hermann. Lisa is so disillusioned by his greed for money that she hurls herself into the Neva while Hermann whose luck fails him in the gaming room stabs himself. The scene is laid in St. Petersburg in 1820.

EUNICE ALBERTS was a macabre countess whose vocal opportunities were limited, but who took her part so seriously that it was only in the last half of the second act, which she dominated, that the drama took on suspense and illusion.

David Lloyd, whose acting was sound and consistent, also used a ringing tenor voice with intelligence and conviction. The Count Tomsky of James Pease was also most satisfying musically and in stage deportment. Mac Morgan as Prince Yeletsky had the opportunity of one fine aria and made the most of it. The final scene availed the male chorus of some brilliant Tschaikowskian measures.

The music throughout was most characteristic even to the exquisitely Mozartian accompaniment for the pantomime of the Faithful Shepherdess. From the very overture on to the last curtain were heard the rich textures of which the last three symphonies are made, not in quotation, but from the same fecund and inspired pen.

As a show this opera had its wooden spots, many striking passages and certain ineptitudes where only a very busy and beautiful score sustained interest. For an opera workshop it was perhaps over-ambitious, but if that is a fault it is easily forgiven.

AUS DER MUSIKWELT

Von FRED LOW

Berkshire Festwochen

(Sondermeldung für die "New Yorker Staats-Zeitung und Herold")

LENOX, 29. Juli. — Charles Munch hatte für das Samstag-Konzert in der großen Halle in Tanglewood Webers Ouvertüre zu "Oberon", die sechste Symphonie Prokofieffs und das Klavierkonzert No. 2 von Brahms gewählt. Die Symphonie gehört zu den bedeutendsten Werken eines zeitgenössischen Komponisten, sie ist in den beiden Ecksätzen von dramatischer Wucht und zeigt im langsamen Satz Melodienreichtum und tiefe Empfindung. Die Bostoner spielten das Werk hervorragend, die Kantilene war ausdrucksvoll und die leidenschaftlichen Akzente kamen wirkungsvoll zur Geltung, im Schlußsatz brachte Munch alle Brillanz der Partitur zum Vorschein.

Die "Oberon"-Ouvertüre klang prachtvoll in den Hornthemen und in der Entwicklung der Streicherfiguren und die Begleitung des Brahms-Konzertes zeigte die musikalisch sichere Führung des Dirigenten. Claudio Arrau war der Solist in diesem Werk, die technischen Schwierigkeiten wurden von ihm mühelos überwunden, die Interpretation zeigte den Meisterpianisten. Soloinstrument und Orchester ergänzen sich in dem Konzert, die tragischen Themen des ersten Satzes von den Hörnern angestimmt, werden im Dialog mit dem Klavier durchgeführt, im Scherzo, das von Brahms als "unbedeutend" bezeichnet wurde, treten die leidenschaftlichen Passagen hervor; Arrau bringt den straffen Rhythmus des Satzes ausgezeichnet und im Andante erklingt die Melodie, die fast identisch mit "Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer" ist, poetisch und gesangvoll. Pianist und Orchester vereinigten sich im Finale zu der grandiosen Steigerung, die zum triumphalen Schlußakkord führt.

Im Sonntagnachmittags-Konzert hörte man die Barbers Ouvertüre "The School of Scandal" und "Quiet City" (für Trompete, Englisch Horn und Streicher) von Aaron Copland. Beide Komponisten waren anwesend, um sich für den herzlichen Beifall des Publikums zu bedanken. Die Wiedergabe zeigte die sorgfältige Probearbeit und die Einfühlung des Dirigenten in die geistreiche Musik Barbers und die Phantasie Coplands.

Mit dem Vortrag der "Tragischen" Symphonie Schuberts (No. 4, C-Moll) erreichte Munch den Höhepunkt des Programms, er läßt die Themen plastisch hervortreten, die Phrasierung ist in der Kontinuität bezaubernd. Der zweite Satz war besonders schön gespielt, die Einheitlichkeit der einzelnen Streichergruppen, die Nuancierung der Holzbläser und die Klangmischung ergaben ein prachtvolles Tonbild.

Den Abschluß des Konzertes bildete die Wiedergabe der D-Moll Symphonie César Francks; man kennt die Interpretation des Dirigenten aus früheren Konzerten, er faßt die Musik Francks leidenschaftlich auf, die Tempoänderungen sind manchmal übersteigert und unruhig, aber im Finale findet der Dirigent schließlich zu dem tief innerlichen Ausdruck, zu der grandiosen Entwicklung, die das Werk Francks kennzeichnet.

PLAN PROGRAM IN MEMORY OF KOUSSEVITZKY

Tanglewood Event to Be Thursday; Week End of Mozart Music

Tanglewood, July 20—Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony and Mozart's Funeral Music in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, at the first concert of the Berkshire Festival in the music shed at Tanglewood Thursday evening. Saturday morning rehearsals will be open to the public beginning July 28 for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. For the Berlioz there were cast in France a bell in C and one in G, which Mr. Munch ordered in place of the tubular chimes which American orchestras usually employ for the effect of the tolling of French church bells.

Mozart Programs

In the second concert of the A series Claudio Arrau will be the soloist in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, which will be preceded by Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. The series will end Sunday afternoon with Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Fourth Symphony, and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor.

This week end Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two Mozart programs. That for Saturday night will be the "Haffner" Symphony, the "Missa Brevis," Hugh Ross conducting the Festival chorus with Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass; Adagio and Fugue for String Orchestra and Symphony in E flat major. Sunday's program will include Divertimento in B flat major for strings and two horns; Violin Concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist; and the "Prague" Symphony.

This Sunday morning at 10:30 at Berkshire Music Center the chamber music group will play Brahms' Quintet in B minor for clarinet and string quartet, Aaron Copland's Vitebsk (Study on a Jewish Theme for Violin, Violoncello and Piano; and the Debussy Quartet in G minor. Sunday night and Friday at 4.30 students will play compositions of their colleagues.

Song Recital

Going into their fourth week, they will give a song recital Tuesday at 4.30 and a program of opera scenes Tuesday evening, with a concert by the small choir Wednesday afternoon. The Moyse Trio will play Wednesday evening, gift of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation in the Library of Congress.

The students will dedicate their Friday-evening concert to the memory of Dr. Koussevitzky, with numbers representing all departments.

The chorus will sing the Bach Cantata No. 118; the chamber music group will play Schubert's Trout Quintet; the composers will offer an original work; the opera department will present a concert version of a scene from Pique Dame, Tchaikovsky's opera with which Dr. Koussevitzky planned to make his debut as opera conductor; and the orchestra will perform Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, originally commissioned by the Boston Orchestra for its 50th anniversary in 1930.

Concert and rehearsal tickets may be purchased at the box office, Tanglewood, England Brothers, Pittsfield, and the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge. Student events and Coloidge concert are open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Munch Accents the Dramatic in Music

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Special to The Hartford Times

LENOX, Mass. — There is a world of difference between Charles Munch conducting in the great music shed and his interpretations in the theater-concert hall during the three weekends given over to Bach, Haydn and Mozart.

Those were chaste, fastidiously etched performances in which design and spirit were uppermost. The concerts Thursday, Saturday and Sunday were exciting, dramatic, almost theatrical.

Since any explanation is bound to be a surmise, the best I can offer is that Mr. Munch has underestimated the acoustical properties of the huge pavilion and is over-reaching, not only to fill it with sound but to register with his outside audience way out beyond.

Eliel Saarinen's shed is so happily constructed that the music fans out over a wide space with remarkably little dissipation or distortion. This was not true of the smaller hall especially with the reduced orchestra, but the conductor then seemed to scale his dynamics to the listeners indoors.

WHAT WAS good for Berlioz Thursday night ran a fever in Cesar Franck Sunday afternoon. The D minor Symphony was over in a remarkably short time, no doubt a record. It was loud, often brassy; it throbbed with a pounding pulse and was so far from pietism and contemplation that heaven was literally stormed. In a word, Mr. Munch removed the faraway look in the eyes of this most introspective of symphonies. It was received with unqualified enthusiasm by an audience which was much more intent upon recalling Mr. Munch than in getting off the grounds, which is unusual for a Sunday crowd.

Some allowance ought to be made for the circumstance that Mr. Munch took over a program schedule not of his own selection. I imagined that he would rather have been doing something other than Schubert's C minor Symphony which certainly was not "Tragic", as its nickname ineptly implies. That it wasn't particularly Schubertian is another and a more serious matter. Surely Mr. Munch, who did Weber's "Oberon" Overture so affectionately on Saturday night could have expended a little more love and sympathy on the Schubert opus.

Speaking of program changes makes it necessary to observe that Copland's "Quiet City" got its third or fourth Tanglewood performance yesterday, putting it on a par with the "Eroica" and the symphonies of Brahms. It isn't quite that important but any composition which provides solos for Roger Voisin's trumpet and Louis Speyer's English horn needs no further excuse for being. These two artists got a big hand, as did Mr. Copland.

Present also but too modest to come forward at Mr. Munch's invitation was Samuel Barber whose Overture to "The School for Scandal" opened the program. The conductor seemed to relish it immensely and contagiously, for there was a fine mannered piquancy in its merry and ingenious measures.

THE CONTEMPORARY number on Saturday's program was Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. It received a flattering and highly polished performance but the major experience of the evening was the Brahms B flat piano concerto with Claudio Arrau at the keyboard.

I have never seen conductor and soloist so solicitous for a balanced performance. This was not carried to the point of diffidence but did represent a genuine collaboration. The orchestra has a score which could easily become symphonic and dominant. The composer was, on the other hand, impartial and entrusted to the solo instrument enough notes so that a pianist more steely-fingered than Mr. Arrau happens to be can get quite upstage should he feel so disposed.

I don't think anyone who heard this performance will ever forget the other-worldly duo between piano and cello in the third movement. It was so precious an interlude that Mr. Munch insisted that Cellist Samuel Mayes be recognized by a delighted audience co-equally with the soloist.

TWO HITS HEARD AT TANGLEWOOD SERIES OPENER

Works by Beethoven and Ravel Meet Approval Of 7000 Listeners

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, Aug. 2—There were two sure fire hits on this, the opening program of the second series of concerts being given here at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch.

Two War Horses

These two war horses were Beethoven's sixth or "Pastorale" Symphony and Ravel's gorgeous "Rapsodie Espagnole. Around these two, Mr. Munch placed the overture to Schumann's "Opera Za Genoveva" and concluded the program with Roussel's "Symphony No. 3 in G Minor," which he wrote for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Munch was in his most lyrical vein during his reading of the Beethoven Symphony. He did summon up a storm in the third movement which was worthy of these manufactured here in the Berkshire Hills on a moment's notice. The "Pastorale" is one of Beethoven's most ingratiating symphonies, but last night it seemed to be suffering from anaemia. The birds twittered prettily and everyone seemed happy after the storm was over.

Another Matter

Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" was another matter entirely. Seldom thus far this season has the orchestra played so brilliantly. Mr. Munch provided a reading abounding in virility, yet in the more tranquil moments he summoned sounds which delighted the ear. Robert Schumann wrote the opera "Genoveva" in 1847. The opera has since joined the ranks of those remembered only by their overtures. The overture to "Genoveva" is a fine concert piece. It has considerable strength, a wealth of melodic and rhythmic elements of deep emotion and only Schumann could contrive it.

A Jaunty Piece

Albert Roussel wrote his third symphony for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and it was performed by that orchestra in Boston Oct. 23, 1930. It is a jaunty piece of the modern French school, but it is indisputably the work of a master craftsman, a composer who neither reaches backwards or around him for his inspirations. He finds melodies which interest him and treats them in his own fashion. The result is not always pleasant to the ear, for it is often brassy, but it has style and brio typically French. Mr. Munch provided a brilliant reading and the orchestra responded enthusiastically.

The estimated 7000 persons, many of them out under the stars of a gloriously clear, cold night, applauded the symphony in a manner which indicated that repeated hearings might well bring it into the ranks of popular repertoire.

Tanglewood Code:

Shorts No Longer a la Mode

Lenox, Aug. 2 (AP)—Tanglewood officials would "prefer" that ladies wear skirts to the famous summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But more and more of the female music lovers have been showing up in slacks or shorts.

Thomas B. Perry, Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, plans tonight "to give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform."

He will have ushers hand out wrap-around skirts to the informally clad visitors.

After all, Perry said, women students have long been required to wear skirts at the noted summer school taught by Boston Symphony Orchestra artists.

Right now there are only eight wrap-arounds and they will go on a first come-first served basis.

Perry said the skirts come in only two sizes: large and medium.

FOUR FAMOUS WORKS TO OPEN SECOND SERIES

Charles Munch to Direct Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Today

Lenox, Aug. 1—The second series of concerts in the Shed at Tanglewood will begin this Thursday, Aug. 2, when Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Ssymphony oOrchestra, conducts a program of four symphonic masterpieces. Among them will be Beethoven's Sixth, Pastorale, Symphony, often called Tanglewood's own symphony, since its performance at the first concert at Tanglewood in 1937 under Serge Koussevitzky. The remainder of the Thursday evening program, for which seats are still available at the Berkshire Festival ticket office, consists of Schumann's Overture to Genoveva; Revel's Rapsodie Espagnole; and Roussel's lively Third Symphony.

Saturday evening, Mr. Munch will conduct a concert beginning with Handel's 18th Century Water Music Ssuite, and continuing with Bela Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, Ravel's Second Daphnis and Chloe Suite, this time with the rarely used choral parts, and concluding with Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3, with organ. E. Power Brigs will play the organ.

On Sunday afternoon, Aug. 5, Eleazar de Carvalho will be guest conductor for his annual appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Featured on his program will be Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, with the Cuban pianist, Jorge Bolet, as soloist. Other works to be performed Sunday afternoon will be Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, Strauss' Death and Transfiguration, and Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition, with orchestration by Ravel.

As usual during the Berkshire Festival season there will be a public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday morning. Admission to these rehearsals, which begin at ten and continue for more than two hours, is sold at the Tanglewood entrances, and is for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund; ordinarily, rehearsals of the orchestra are closed to the public.

Second Series of Concerts At Festival Opens Tomorrow

Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open the second series of Berkshire Festival concerts at Tanglewood tomorrow evening with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," which Robert Schumann wrote in 1847 and which was first performed in Leipzig three years later. Produced in many opera houses in Middle Europe the latter part of the last century, it is being revived in Rhinecliff, this season.

Beethoven's Sixth "Pastoral" Symphony, the second number on the program, is often called the Tanglewood symphony since it was played in the second concert by the orchestra at Tanglewood in 1937, the year of the thunderstorm that pointed out the necessity for a permanent building for the Festival, instead of a tent, and because its music is reminiscent of nature, relaxation and at times rustic vigor. It was completed in 1808 and performed for the first time in the same year in Vienna.

The Rapsodie Espagnole, composed in 1907, was one of the first pieces to draw general attention to Ravel's skill in orchestral writing. He had written before in the Spanish rhythm, of which he grew increasingly fond.

Roussel wrote his third symphony, the concluding number of the concert, for the Boston Orchestra's 50th anniversary season. It was performed in October, 1930, with the composer present.

Tickets are on sale for the concert, as for those of the week end, at the box office, Tanglewood, Eagland Brothers, Pittsfield and the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge.

The concert by the small choirs, planned for Friday afternoon at 4.30 by the students, under Hugh Ross, has been canceled.

Boston Symphony Opens Tanglewood's 2d Week

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 2. — The second week end of Berkshire Festival concerts in the shed at Tanglewood opened tonight with a program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Charles Munch again conducting. In contrast to last week's opening concert of the season in the shed, tonight's event was favored with congenial, clear and cool weather.

The major work on the evening's list was Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, the Pastorale, which has special associations for those who have followed the progress of music here since the opening concerts on the Tanglewood estate in 1937. For it was at the first concert conducted by Serge Koussevitzky in the summer of that year that the Beethoven work was performed. A Berkshire Festival had been given the year before but not in Lenox.

The other works on tonight's program were Schumann's Overture to Genoveva, Favel's Rapsodie Espagnole, and Roussel's Third Symphony.

The estimated attendance was well over 7,000 and many of the listeners heard the concert from the lawn behind the shed, sprawling on blankets which were also useful as protection from the cool evening air.

Festival Wraps Up Problem of Shorts

Tanglewood is getting clothes conscious.

Female tourists who dress for comfort while traveling, but want to don apparel more appropriate than shorts or slacks for a tour through the grounds, will now be furnished wrap-around skirts by the management, according to Thomas D. Perry Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Center.

Mr. Perry explains that women students at the Center are asked to wear skirts. To give unexpected guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform, eight brightly colored wrap-around skirts were purchased from England Brothers and are being made available during a tour of the Center.

Four of the skirts are mediums, and four are large. Mr. Perry said he feels they should cover the situation.

The skirts will also be handed out on a first come, first serve basis for the evening concerts, according to Mr. Perry. However, he pointed out the Center could not be expected to clothe the entire audience.

Tanglewood To Present Comic Opera

For its second major production of the 1951 season, the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center will present Richard Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" on Monday and Tuesday evenings in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. The production will be conducted by Sarah Caldwell, with staging by Boris Goldovsky and Miss Caldwell.

The libretto by Hugo von Hoffmannsthal will be sung in English translation. Between the usual prologue and the opera itself there will be a spoken interlude based on Molière's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," especially written for this performance by Eugene Haun.

The opera represents an entertainment at the home of a patron of music in the 18th century who has arranged for his protégé-composer to stage a serious opera, to be followed by a performance of a commedia dell'arte troupe with clowns and a fireworks display capping his evening's entertainment.

The patron's insistence on promptness for the fireworks leads him to require that both musical works be performed at the same time, to the dismay of the composer. As a result, the opera concerning the classical Greek story of Ariadne is performed with a superimposed play by the clowns. The music is similarly intertwined.

The cast includes James Pease, Mac Morgan, Georgianna Bannister, Marguerite Stagliano, Robert Price, Raymond Smolover, Reid Shelton, Gene Cox, Robert Minser, Peter Trump, Jacqueline Bazinet, Eloise Stoughton, Gladys Spector, William Walker, Robert Mesrobian, Lawrence Avery.

Attendance at Tanglewood opera productions is open to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center to the capacity of the Theater-Concert Hall. The Friends of the Berkshire Music Center help to support the school by their voluntary contributions.

GOLF LESSON FOR MUNCH: The leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, right, gets a few pointers from James Stagliano, one of his horn players, who recently made a 160-yard hole-in-one on the Stockbridge Country Club course. These Friends' voluntary contributions to the Berkshire Music School Center constitute such membership.

Tanglewood Students Will Present American Music

TANGLEWOOD — The student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center will give a concert of American music tomorrow evening in the Tanglewood Music Shed.

Beginning with Walton's Overture, "Portsmouth Point," conducted by Russell Stanger, the program will include Bartok's portrait for violin and orchestra, Ma Si Hon playing the violin solo and Charles Roth conducting, and Milhaud's concerto for violoncello, with Robert Sayre playing the cello part and Frank Italiano conducting.

Howard Shanet, teacher in the conducting department, will lead the second half of the program, with the numbers: Schoenberg's piece No. 3 from five orchestral pieces and Hindemith's symphonic metamorphosis of themes.

The concert planned for tomorrow afternoon by the small choir with Hugh Ross, director, has been canceled.

Tomorrow evening's program will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center whose contributions support the school.

Tanglewood to Provide Skirts for Listeners

LENOX, Aug. 2 (AP)—Tanglewood officials would "prefer" that ladies wear skirts to the famous summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But more and more of the female music lovers have been showing up in slacks or shorts.

Thomas B. Perry, Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, plans tonight "to give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform."

He will have ushers hand out wrap-around shirts to the informally clad visitors.

After all, Perry said, women students have long been required to wear skirts at the noted summer school taught by Boston Symphony Orchestra artists.

Right now there are only eight wraparounds and they will go on a first come-first served basis.

Perry said the skirts come in only two sizes: large and medium.

Berkshire Units In Washington Chamber Concerts

NEW YORK, July 13—(UP)—The Berkshire Music Center of Tanglewood in Massachusetts is presenting three concerts of chamber music in the Library of Congress in Washington under the sponsorship of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation.

The first, given this past week, was by the New Music Quartet, playing quartets by Hindemith, Verdi and Beethoven. On July 18, the Berkshire Trio will be heard in a program including early French music. The Moyse Trio will offer a program ranging from Bach to the moderns on July 25.

The concerts are for students and the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, but are also open to the interested public.

Boston Symphony Plays At Tanglewood Aug. 10

The annual "Tanglewood on Parade" program for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center will be held next Friday, Aug. 10, at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. The principal feature will be an evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Charles Munch, Eleazar de Carvalho, Leonard Bernstein and Richard Burgin conducting. The soloists are Ruth Posselt, violinist, and Mr. Bernstein, doubling as conductor and pianist. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt will speak. The program:

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" ..... Berlioz
Mr. de Carvalho conducting
Nigun ..... Bloch
Tango Espanol ..... Arbos
Miss Posselt, Mr. Burgin conducting
Rhapsody in Blue ..... Gershwin
Mr. Bernstein as conductor and pianist
Address by Mrs. Roosevelt
La Mer ..... Debussy
Mr. Munch conducting

Demonstrations by the Berkshire Music Center's various departments will begin at 6 o'clock. Holders of box and reserved seats, priced at $5 and $4, are entitled to attend a performance of Gian-Carlo Menotti's opera, "Amelia Goes to the Ball," beginning at 4:30. Seats in the unreserved section of Tanglewood's Music Shed are priced at $2.50. Full information about tickets is obtainable from the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Lenox, Mass.

OPERATION WRAP-AROUND: Miss Ellen Berkowitz of Philadelphia unknowingly forgot about the new Tanglewood rule on slacks and shorts when she appeared for the student concert yesterday. So Daniel Deykin, one of the attendants, promptly supplied one of the eight yellow denim wrap-around skirts which have been stocked just for the more informally clad visitors. Looking on is Miss Cynthia Swift of Brewster. The new rule is that visitors to the grounds and patrons of concerts, where no admission is charged, shall conform to sartorial standards of Berkshire Music Center management.

100 United Nations Persons Are Berkshire Guests Again

Secretariat Members on 2d Annual Week-End Visit—Schedule Includes Tanglewood Concerts, Parties, Picnics

Just 12 minutes after the New Haven Railroad discharged 100 foreigners from all over the world at Union Station last night, each of these U.N. secretariat members was introduced to his Berkshire host, and started on a week end of music and outdoor activities.

The second annual visit here by United Nations personnel was under way today with picnicking and sightseeing and a round of dinner parties scheduled to precede this evening's Tanglewood concert.

Much of the activity is centered around Pontoosuc Lake, where a score of the visitors are assembling this afternoon for sailing, swimming, canoeing, water skiing, tennis and volleyball at the south shore. They are the guests of groups of young GE engineers at the Castle and the GE Club; of girls in two co-operative houses there; and of others staying at Camp Merrill on the east shore.

Chinese Coop Party

After the arrival of the U.N. [illegible] last night, about 40 young people gathered at the Chinese Coop, south shore home of Prof. a dozen girls, for refreshments and singing of American and international songs—Indian, Dutch and Hungarian.

The visitors and their hosts will be guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at concerts tonight and tomorrow afternoon. This year's week-end visit is sponsored by the Pittsfield Rotary Club, which was chosen by the Workshop for World Understanding to handle arrangements.

Also at Tanglewood this week end will be 40 foreign students from Massachusetts Institute of Technology, where they are taking a six-month course in scientific subjects. Their studies are financed by foundations and other private funds, with the help of the college and the State Department. Others in their group attended last week's concerts.

EVENTS LISTED FOR LAST 9 DAYS AT TANGLEWOOD

Munch Conducts Orchestra In Varied Program Tonight

Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 3—Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night in Handel's "Water Music", Bartok's Music for Strings and Percussion, Saint Saens' Third Symphony, with organ, and Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe". The last was played in the second concert that the orchestra played at Tanglewood, in 1937, but without chorus. Sunday afternoon, under Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian guest conductor, the program will include Weber's Overture to Euryanthe, Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 2, with Jorge Bolet as soloist, Moussourgsky-Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition" and Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration".

The final week-end of the Berkshire Festival will open next Thursday evening with Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, conducted by Leonard Bernstein, with soloists Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra Saturday night in Beethoven's First Symphony, Honegger's Fifth and Tchaikovsky's Sixth, "Pathetique", and the 1951 Festival will conclude Sunday afternoon with an all-Brahms program: Variations on a Theme by Haydn and the Second and Fourth Symphonies.

Events at the Berkshire Music Center will include chamber music each Sunday morning at 10, a composers' forum Tuesday afternoon at 4.30 and another Wednesday evening at 8.15, performances of Richard Strauss' opera, "Ariadne auf Naxos" Monday and Tuesday evenings, a song recital Wednesday afternoon and an orchestral concert at 3 Saturday.

At "Tanglewood on Parade" Friday, Aug. 10 for the benefit of the school, Mr. Munch and Mr. Bernstein will conduct the Boston Orchestra, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak and Mr. Bernstein will play the piano solo in George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," a bonus for reserved seat and box ticket holders will be a performance of Menotti's, "Amelia Goes to the Ball," at 4.30. For everyone will be hour-long performances of symphonic and chamber music, opera and choral singing at 6, followed by an interval for picnicking on the lawn or a snack at the canteen. A 10-minute speech by Mrs. Roosevelt and the Boston orchestra concert will be at 8.15, followed by dancing on the lawn.

The orchestra will rehearse Saturday mornings at 10 for the benefit of the pension fund.

Student events will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center whose contributions support the school. Seats for "Adriadne" must be limited to those whose donations were received early. Festival, rehearsal and "Tanglewood on Parade" tickets and information are available at the box office, Tanglewood, Lenox, where contributions are received for the school.

PALSY BENEFIT ARTISTS: Leonard Bernstein, left, talks over with Josef Zimbler the score of the Mozart piano concerto in G major, which Mr. Bernstein will perform with the Zimbler Sinfonietta Monday at 4 PM in the South Mountain Concert Hall. The program, which will also include works by Bach, Roussel and Boyce, is for the benefit of the United Cerebral Palsy Association, with all performers donating their talents. The Zimbler Sinfonietta is a string ensemble composed of 17 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program will mark Mr. Bernstein's first appearance of the season as a soloist.

'Parade' Program Listed

TANGLEWOOD — The complete program for "Tanglewood on Parade," the annual event to be held Friday for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center has been announced.

Eleazar deCarvalho will open the evening concert at 8.30 with Berlioz' Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra will conduct Bloch's "Nigun, for Violin and Orchestra" and Arbos' tango Espagnol, with his wife, Ruth Posselt, playing the solo parts. Leonard Bernstein will conduct and play the solo part in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," for piano and orchestra.

At the intermission of the musical program, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak for 10 minutes. The program will conclude with Debussy's "La Mer," three orchestral sketches: "From Dawn to Moon on the Sea," "Play of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea."

All ticket holders will be invited to attend the activities of the school at 6, with students performing in the symphony orchestra, opera, chorus and chamber music. Those with reserved section and box seats will have an additional invitation to a special performance of Menotti's opera, "Amelia Goes to the Ball" at 4.30 in the theatre-concert hall.

Tickets are on sale at the box office, Tanglewood and England Brothers, Pittsfield.

Contest on Koussevitzky Will Moved by Nephew, Musician

Fabien Sevitzky, 57, conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, who was not named in the will of his uncle, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of Lenox, retired conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has taken court action indicating an attempt to break the will.

The nephew, whose name originally [illegible] shortened it, has had [illegible] years, because he didn't want to be accused of trying to cash in on the reputation of his famous uncle.

Sevitzky filed in Probate Court in Dedham an appearance against the allowance of Koussevitzky's will. The amount of the estate has not been disclosed.

Under terms of the will, drawn last May 15, no mention or provision was made for Sevitzky. His famed uncle died June 5 at the age of 76. Koussevitzky left the bulk of his estate to his third wife Olga with several minor bequests.

In a petition for allowance of the will Sevitzky was listed as "heir at law" with Koussevitzky's wife, two other nephews, Joseph and Boris Koussevitzky, and a niece Sophia Koussevitzky.

BACH BAJO ESTRELLAS

Músicos del Hemisferio en el Festival de Berkshire

Este año, por la primera vez desde 1936, el famoso Festival de Música de Berkshire—que se efectúa los meses de julio y agosto en Tanglewood, un hermoso parque cerca de Lenox, en el Estado de Massachusetts, EE.UU.—se llevó a cabo sin su creador, el renombrado y bien estimado Serge Koussevitsky. De este maestro, muerto recientemente, dijo un sudamericano asistente al Festival: "La sensación que se experimenta no es la misma sin Koussevitsky". Sin embargo, el sueño que Koussevitsky sustentó por largos años: un centro de música donde la juventud pudiera escuchar y trabajar con los mejores músicos contemporáneos, es hoy, más que nunca, una realidad.

Exito internacional: El concierto de apertura del Festival de Música fué dirigido por Charles Munch, quien ha ocupado la dirección de la orquesta sinfónica de Boston, en el lugar de Koussevitsky. El público, compuesto por amantes de la música de todo el mundo, llenó no sólo la parte cubierta—donde toca la orquesta y hay miles de asientos—sino también los prados y jardines cercanos. Bajo el cielo estrellado y con una insinuación de luna nueva, los amantes de la buena música tendieron sus mantas, sus cojines y sus pequeños canastos de pic nic en los verdes e inmensos prados de grama fresca.

Este año, hay ya más de 450 estudiantes de diferentes naciones que estudian bajo la dirección de músicos notables. Entre estos estudiantes hay varios de la América Latina (véase foto).

En el programa de conciertos de este año, se incluyen también tres músicos latinoamericanos: Claudio Arrau, el conocido pianista chileno, Jorge Bolet, pianista cubano, y Eleazar de Carvalho, el brillante brasileño, director de orquesta y protegido de Koussevitsky. Desde su debut en 1948, cuando los críticos llamaron a Carvalho "sensacional", su silueta, siempre de traje blanco, ha sido familiar en el parque de Tanglewood. Este año, además de dar clases de dirección de orquestas, Carvalho presenta, por primera vez en los EE. UU., una sinfonía del compositor brasileño Guarnieri.

Niño travieso: Para Carvalho, el camino musical fué rudo. Hasta los diez años de edad trabajó con sus padres, agricultores pobres, bajo el sol inclemente de Ignatu, en el noroeste remoto del interior del Brasil. Expulsado de una escuela tras la otra, finalmente entró a la marina. En las noches estudiaba música y tocaba el contrabajo (instrumento que escogió simplemente porque era el más grande) en circos y cabarets. En 1941, después de ser director de la sinfónica, se fué a los Estados Unidos donde buscó la ayuda e instrucción de Koussevitsky.

Serge Koussevitsky fué "padre, amigo, instructor y empresario" para el recién llegado. Siguiendo su ejemplo, Carvalho ha organizado concursos y becas para músicos brasileños jóvenes. También se ha encargado de introducir la música de compositores como Villa-Lobos en los Estados Unidos y cada año regresa a Río con trabajos de compositores norteamericanos modernos, como Aaron Copland y Virgil Thomson.

La semana pasada, Carvalho declaró a VISIÓN: "Después de todo, Koussevitsky sabía que la música era internacional. Tanglewood es un símbolo de esa creencia y debemos mantenerla".

Slack Season at Tanglewood

Perhaps the debate now raging at Tanglewood will never go down alongside such past controversies of musical history as piano vs. harpsichord and aria vs. recitative, but it is interesting enough. The new question is skirts vs. slacks, and the musical traditionalists, as they very often do, hold the upper hand.

We take no position on the substance of this question ourselves. Listening to music is a highly subjective pastime. Some prefer it in formal wear at Carnegie Hall, others favor an old bathrobe near a radio. The Tanglewood Festival evidently has varying types of listeners, too. Perhaps those in charge of the concerts could make a survey of the correlation of musical and sartorial tastes. Do those who prefer shorts also prefer Stravinsky? Is there a relation between long skirts and long symphonies? The Festival makes no report on such matters, yet obviously there is material for a statistical study. So far, all we know is that ushers are presenting wrap-around skirts to all female visitors clad in shorts and slacks, and that these skirts come in only two sizes—large and medium. There is no small size. Obviously there are more cellos at Tanglewood than piccolos.

By DAVID J. MALCOLM

The opening concert in the Shed at Tanglewood last Thursday evening was tense with excitement. Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was making his first appearance as conductor in the Shed and critics were watching him carefully, but when the program closed the verdict was unanimous. In the hands of Charles Munch, successor of Serge Koussevitzky, the future of the Tanglewood is safe.

During intermission that evening, an informal reception was held in the boxes for Ambassador Henri Bonnet of France and Mme. Bonnet, who had come from Washington to pay their respects to the great French conductor, Dr. Munch. Both the ambassador and Mme. Bonnet proved charming, but it was Mme. Bonnet that we were anxious to meet for we had always heard that she was one of the handsomest and best dressed women in Washington. We were not disappointed.

For the benefit of our feminine readers, we wish at this time to report that Mme. Bonnet wore a little something that she picked up in Paris, which was very becoming. It was a gown of silver and black brocade, of simple cut, with a strapless top and a stole of the same material. The skirt was tight, slightly draped. Her hair is iron gray, short, with a close, very smart bob. She has hazel eyes. We liked her.

This coming Sunday, Aug. 5, Eleazar de Carvalho will be guest conductor for his annual appearance at Tanglewood, and in addition to a program featuring Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, weather permitting, there will be another pageantry of color and life as multitudes of music lovers loiter on spacious lawns, beneath ancient elms or assemble within the Shed.

We never tire of arriving early to watch the endless procession, the gorgeous attire of some, the attractive sportswear of others, the simple indifference of a few. It is a laboratory sampling of America in a cultural mood—strange, unusual, fascinating.

Fabien Sevitzky, Nephew, Moves To Contest Koussevitzky Will

A legal battle over the will of Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years, was indicated yesterday, when an appearance was filed in Norfolk probate court by a Boston law firm in behalf of a nephew, Fabien Sevitsky, 37-year-old conductor of the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra.

The Koussevitzky will, drawn only a few weeks before the distinguished conductor's death on June 4 of this year, made no mention of nor provision for Sevitzky.

In filing the will with the court some weeks ago the executors listed as heirs at law the widow, Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky; a niece, Sophia Koussevitzky, and two nephews, Joseph and Boris Koussevitzky. The nephews and niece were described as "of parts unknown."

In his will Koussevitzky left the bulk of his estate to his wife, but made substantial provision for the Serge Koussevitzky Music Foundation in the Library of Congress, and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation, which was incorporated in New York in 1942. The amount of the estate has not been revealed.

The notice of appearance foreshadowing a contest of the will by Sevitzky was filed by the Boston law firm of Mintz, Levin and Cohn of 50 Federal street.

Attorneys for the will, which was drawn May 15, 1951, are Welch and Forbes of 73 Tremont street and Abraham Friedman of 40 Wall street, New York.

In Brief . . .

Tanglewood's idea of providing wrap-around skirts for visitors who arrive in less decorous garb seems an ingenious solution for a perennial New England problem. In future years, a pipe-rack of wraparounds may be standard equipment for police stations in those many Yankee towns that still look askance at shorts on Main Street . . . We all owe a big vote of thanks to the many families that are helping make international fellowship a reality by entertaining members of the U.N. secretariat here this week end. The fact that more U.N. people applied than the trip than could be accepted is a nice tribute to Berkshire hospitality.

Lester Roberts who runs Wheatleigh for students at Tanglewood, feeds and houses 36 young people there, a far cry from the days he ran the Curtis Hotel in Lenox. However, since he's retired from the hotel business, he finds Wheatleigh just about right. This year's students, he says, are more serious-minded and industrious than ever. A musician's life is not an easy one, and they're finding it out early.

A VITAL INSTITUTION

The Berkshire Music Center Continues The Work Begun by Koussevitzky

By OLIN DOWNES

IF there ever were exhibitions of the vitality of an idealistic institution founded by a man of genius whose inspiration put its imprint on everything that institution had done since it was started, even after the master has gone, it is the music school known as the Berkshire Music Center which Serge Koussevitzky established against all sorts of difficulties and confusions at Tanglewood.

This observation is based upon two performances, one a concert and one an opera, which the Berkshire Music Center gave last week at Tanglewood in Lenox in the Berkshires. The first concert was one in which representative products of each department of the school were to appear in a program devoted to Koussevitzky's memory. This affair was poorly organized and the performances were for the most part second-rate. The diversity of the products was interesting and has been recounted before this in THE NEW YORK TIMES. But the one performance which had the quality of which Koussevitzky had conceived was that of Lorin Maazel's direction of the performance by orchestra and chorus of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

The rest of the concert gave the impression of much zeal, much enthusiasm, much team work of a sort by the participants, but that "sort" was more indicative of artistic enthusiasm than of finished accomplishment. It was a throwoff, as it were, of various teachers and their pupils—or shall we say disciples?—which, viewed in the large, bore testimony to the creative spirit engendered by this gathering of musicians at the Berkshire Festival; but it did not constitute an example of performances carefully prepared and finished to show the level of technical achievement by the students of a music school. The concert did something else. It bore testimony to the spirit of art and cooperative music making and music study on the higher levels which was Koussevitzky's fundamental purpose in founding this unique "school."

Tchaikovsky Opera

The performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" or rather the first of the two performances by the opera department, which were given on Monday and Tuesday evenings by two different casts, was a more astonishing exhibition, one more emphatic than ever of the purposes of this singularly vital and dauntless organization. To recall what Boris Goldovsky of the opera department, to put it graphically, was "up against" in this particular undertaking?

Koussevitzky had his heart set on a production of "Pique Dame," to be prepared, as regards chorus, soloists and stage business, by Goldovsky, and conducted by himself. This had been decided upon last May. This alone is no slight affair from the production standpoint alone. It requires seven different sets of scenery. Scenery and costumes of the opera's period were to be made by the opera school's workshop. This mise-en-scène, the action in detail, the musical coordination of the stage production, including the translation from the Russian, which means also the planning of all the vocal elements—was to be the task of Mr. Goldovsky and his colleagues. Suddenly and tragically, because of Koussevitzky's death, he was also entrusted with the direction of the ochestra.

It would have been simple and correct to have announced that because of the death of Koussevitzky, on the eve of the assembly of the cast, this particularly difficult production would be abandoned. Apparently the idea never so much as entered the consciousness of those who had scheduled the event and who would be responsible for the success or failure. This was the reason that Koussevitzky wanted and that he had wished to direct, his appearing for the first time in his career in America as a conductor of opera.

Apologia

Before the performance, given by invitation in the 1,200-seat theatre for Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Goldovsky stepped from the stage a well-termed apologia for what might or might not happen, by reminding the audience that Koussevitzky was to have conducted the performance, which could not possibly reach the standard that baton in hand, he would have established. In all humility, Mr. Goldovsky said, he and his colleagues would present the opera to the best of their abilities in his name.

The performance proceeded, with a number of long waits between scenes. It had its ups and downs, and no pun is intended. It had brilliant costumes, especially those of the military—officers being abundant in the plot—and some imaginative scenery, done in the modern economical manner of suggestion rather than abundance of apparatus or solidity of material. It had flavor and atmosphere. The orchestra was not well and subtly shaded, and was a little unwieldy under Mr. Goldovsky's stick. What could you expect?

This was his extra little chore—just to conduct that orchestra, which would have been the job of Serge Koussevitzky, on top of all the rest of the work of preparation. We are all for him, his courage, his resolve, which was of a piece with the spirit of Koussevitzky's school. Incredible as it may seem, the net effect of the opera, in spite of many deficiencies noted, was to project in some mysterious and contagious manner the underlying spirit of Tchaikovsky and make you say to yourself "What a remarkable opera it is!"

There is little question in our mind of the validity of a remark that Mr. Munch, conducting the symphonic concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival, made after first praising the festival itself, its facilities, accomplishments and all it stands for. He ended by saying: "The most important thing in the festival is the school." It has the heritage of the spirit of the man who made these symphonic festivals what they are today, and established the unique "academy," as he was wont to term it, to compass the achievements of the orchestra in a broad front which would advance, to the eternal credit of all, the highest interest of the musical art.

More power to their elbows!

Most of their chagrin resulted from their adventures with their 1-month-old son. First they had to pay the full fee for his admission to the grounds and then they were obliged to put on the baby's shirt, the explanation was that "men" were not allowed to appear without their shirts.

Women in Shorts Disturb Propriety of Tanglewood

By The Associated Press.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3—Tanglewood officials "prefer" that women wear skirts when they visit the scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's famous summer concerts.

More and more of them have been showing up recently in shorts or slacks. Today, ushers offered informally clad tourists wrap-around skirts for wear on the grounds.

Thomas B. Perry Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, said the wrap-arounds would "give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform—a skirt."

Strauss Opera at Tanglewood Monday

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., August 5—For its second major production of the 1951 season, the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center will present Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos", tomorrow and Tuesday evenings, August 6 and 7. Last week, the opera department presented Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame", under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, head of the department.

Summer Series Near End; Many Berkshire Concerts

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

Intensive activity marks the last week of the festival season at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., where the annual "Tanglewood on Parade" program for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center will be held Friday in the late afternoon and evening. This will follow the general lines of its predecessors, with demonstrations by the Center's various departments and a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Charles Munch, Eleazar de Carvalho, Richard Burgin and Leonard Bernstein, who will double as conductor and pianist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be the other soloist, and Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt will speak. The programs for the Boston Symphony's last four regular festival concerts are:

Today, 3, Eleazar de Carvalho conducting: Weber, Overture to "Euryanthe"; Strauss, Death and Transfiguration; Prokofieff, Piano Concerto No. 2 (Jorge Bolet); Moussorgsky, Pictures at an Exhibition (arr. Ravel).

Thursday, 8:15, Leonard Bernstein conducting: Beethoven, Missa Solemnis, in memory of Serge Koussevitsky; soloists, Adele Addison, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, James Pease.

Saturday, 8:15, Charles Munch conducting: Beethoven, Symphony No. 1; Honegger, Symphony No. 5; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 6.

Sunday, Aug. 12, 3, Charles Munch conducting: Brahms, Haydn Variations, Symphonies Nos. 2 and 4.

A public rehearsal of the last two programs will be held Saturday morning. As its second and last major production of the season, the Berkshire Music Center's opera department will give Richard Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos" tomorrow and Tuesday nights. Boris Goldovsky is in general charge of the production, which Sarah Caldwell will conduct for audiences of contributing members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

At South Mountain

Several chamber music programs are scheduled for the next few weeks in the concert hall at South Mountain in Pittsfield, a few miles away from Tanglewood. The Zimbler Sinfonietta, directed by Josef Zimbler, will give a program tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock for the benefit of the United Cerebral Palsy Associations of Massachusetts, with Leonard Bernstein as soloist in Mozart's piano concerto in G major (K. 45 3).

Modern Touch Features Concert at Tanglewood

Conductor Munch Starts With Conservative Work, Introducing French Horn in Symphonic Music

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, Aug. 4—Although there was more than a touch of the modern in tonight's concert by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch here at Tanglewood, it began conservatively enough with Sir Hamilton Harty's arrangement of six pieces from the set of 20 which constitute Handel's "Water Music".

Uses French Horn

Listening to this festive music, so martial, graceful, piquant, tuneful, and all so English in manner and style, it is hard to believe that it was composed by a German and not an Englishman. Introducing a French horn for the first time in symhonic music in the fanfare-like opening and closing movements, the composer achieved some stirring and stunning effects. Mr. Munch and his forces gave it an exciting performance.

For Bela Bartok's "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta", Mr. Munch used his score but it in no way bound or cramped his style for he seemed perfectly at home in this difficult music giving it a vivid reading. The wistful theme of the opening "andante" treated contrapuntally, the spread chords in pizzicatto that mark the irregular rhythms of the "allegro", the tap-tap of the xylophone and the simultaneous glissandos on the harp and piano, in the "adagio" all add up to some very bizzare effects which the composer uses successfully to expressive musical ends.

The last movement, although more conventional than the others is exuberantly joyful in its peasant dance rhythms. Listening to such an understanding and spirited performance of this fine modern work was a rewarding experience.

The climax of the first half of the program, however, came in Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, in which the orchestra was assisted by the festival chorus prepared by Hugh Ross. This was without doubt the most thrilling performance of this work we have ever heard and the audience gave evidence of feeling the same way with their "bravos" and demonstrative approval.

The composer, whose intention was to compose a vast musical fresco faithful to the Greece of his dreams, here achieves some stupendous effects which were realized tonight in all of their full symphonic and vocal grandeur, transcendent tonal sounds, and towering climaxes. It was the most dramatic performance Mr. Munch has so far given us.

'Tanglewood on Parade'—

Music Center Will Benefit From Concert

The music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, will share the conducting with three men also familiar to Boston Symphony audiences on Friday evening, Aug. 10, in a special concert held for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. This program will be the feature of "Tanglewood on Parade"; the proceeds are earmarked for the summer school for young musicians maintained at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts.

Friday evening's program will begin with Berlioz' Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," with Eleazar de Carvalho conducting. The concertmaster of the orchestra, Richard Burgin, will conduct the next two works: Bloch's "Nigun" for Violin and Orchestra, and Arbos' "Tango Espagnol." Mr. Burgin's wife, Ruth Posselt, will be soloist in both pieces. Then Leonard Bernstein will play and conduct Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" for Piano and Orchestra.

Following this, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak to the audience briefly, Charles Munch will conduct the closing work of the concert, Debussy's "La Mer."

As in the past, "Tanglewood on Parade" also provides an opportunity for ticket purchasers to attend the activities of the students at the Berkshire Music Center. All departments will be performing varied programs in their specialties after 6 o'clock Friday afternoon. For purchasers of box seats and seats in the reserved sections, the opera department will stage, at 4:30 in the afternoon, a special production of "Amelia Goes to the Ball," by Gian-Carlo Menotti. There will also be waltzing on the lawn, and a door prize, as yet to be announced.

Seats are now available at the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Lenox, Mass.

The first, to be given this coming week, is played by the New Music Quartet, featuring quartets of Hindemith, Verdi and Beethoven. On July 30 the Berkshire Trio will be heard in a program including early French music. Final concert of the series, Aug. 3, will introduce the Moyse Trio which will offer a program ranging from Bach to the moderns.

Concerts are for students and the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, but will also be open to the interested public.

Munch Likes French Suits, Canasta and Good Food

Special to The Hartford Times

Lenox—Tanglewood visitors are finding an interesting character study in Charles Munch, whose name is added to a list of famous men, and women who have made the Berkshires a center of culture since the middle of the last century.

Mr. Munch, new music director of the Boston Symphony and conductor of the Berkshire Festival, comes of a musical family. His father, Ernst Munch, was an organist and professor at the Conservatory of Music in Strasbourg, and founded the famous choir of St. Guillaume.

All six children in the family played instruments. Fritz conducts the Municipal Orchestra in Strasbourg, wehe Charles was born and where he was concertmaster in 1919. Emma married a brother of Albert Schweitzer, famous biographer of Bach and Goethe.

SIX FEET tall, slender, though with broad shoulders, gracefull and gray-haired, Mr. Munch, at 58, is a handsome man, with a winning smile. Appearing shy, except when he is conducting, he likes to escape when a concert or rehearsal is finished to study his scores, read, play solitaire or canasta or a few holes of golf.

One night last week, after a Mozart program, with another the next afternoon, he stayed up until 2 for a game of canasta, which he won. Fond of good food, he eats sparingly. He likes good clothes, which he buys in France—crepe-soled shoes, suits made to order.

Madame Munch, a Parisian, is a granddaughter of the founder of a French chocolate company. They were married in 1933, having known each other since his student days. Madame Munch's interests are literary. She is the author of "Novelles du Limousin" and the translator of Thomas Mann's "Toni Kroeger" from German into French.

Like her husband, Madame Munch is unpretentious, preferring to see her friends informally, rather than at large parties. She slips into her seat at Symphony Hall like an ordinary concert-goer. She is spending the summer at their home in Monteux, Switzerland, where her husband would have joined her after completing his schedule of conducting engagements in Europe, had he not been called to Tanglewood by the death of Serge Koussevitzky.

IN THE Berkshires for the first time, excepting during a brief visit in 1948 to his friend, Arthur Honneger, the French composer who suffered a heart attack a week after he had arrived to teach at the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Munch appreciates the beauty of the country. He comments often on the views and the trees, comparing them with those of the Vosges at home.

During the Tanglewood season he is living at Elm Court, until her death 10 years ago the home of Mrs. Henry White, widow of the former ambassador to the Court of St. James's.

CHARLES MUNCH did not always intend to be a musician. When he was 21 he went to Paris to study medicine, but he enjoyed his violin so much that he gave up a physician's career to study with Lucien Capet. This career was interrupted in 1914 by unwilling service in the German Army. He was wounded at Verdun. Between wars he studied violin, taught at the Strasbourg Conservatory and became concert master of the Gewandhaus Orchestra in Leipzig under Furtwaengler and Walter.

In 1929, he went to Paris, where he founded the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris, conducted the Lamoureux Concerts and the Straram Orchestra. He succeeded Philippe Gaubert in 1937 as conductor of the Paris conservatory Orchestra, holding the position through World II, taking no Nazi instructions and aiding the Resistance.

IN 1939 Mr. Munch attempted a trip to the U. S. to conduct the St. Louis Orchestra, but because of travel restrictions was turned back at the Azores. In 1946 he crossed the Atlantic to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 27, and a month later the New York Philharmonic. In 1848, commissioned by the French government, he conducted the National French Radio Orchestra on a coast to coast American tour. In 1949, he succeeded Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

He is liked by orchestra members, audiences and critics. When he took over the directorship of the Boston orchestra, at his first rehearsal he said, "I hope we shall work very hard together—and with much joy." "I make them like what they play. I do not scold them," he told an interviewer.

Dr. Munch Will Conduct Tonight's Concert At Lenox

Charles Munch, director of the Boston Syhphony orchestra will conduct the student orchestra of the Berkshire Music Center for the first time tonight at 8.15.

This concert is the second in the weekly series of performances by the student orchestra at Tanglewood. It will be a full performance of French music.

Mr. Munch will conduct two nocturnes by Debussy, "Clouds" and "Feasts."

Eleazer de Carvalho, another well-known conductor, who is on the faculty at the Berkshire Music Center, will also conduct Friday night. He will lead the orchestra and a student soloist in three movements from the Berlioz symphony, "Harold in Italy." Raymond Montoni will be soloist in the viola part.

Also on the program will be Ravel's Five Children's Pieces, "Mamere l'Oye." Piero Bellugi, conducting; and Chausson's Poems for violin and orchestra with Jeanne Sandbank, soloist and Russell Stanger, conductor.

These Friday evening concerts are perhaps the most popular of all the student performances of the Berkshire Music Center. It is expected that the first appearance of Dr. Munch with the group will add to the great appeal of tonight's program.—

Berkshire Festival Series 'B' in Shed Starts Aug. 2

CHARLES MUNCH will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in The Shed in "Tanglewood" in the opening concert of Series B, Berkshire Festival, next Thursday night. Other events of next week end: a Small Choir concert in The Shed Friday afternoon and a Composers Forum and Orchestra music, also in the Shed, Friday night. Next Saturday morning at 10 o'clock a public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will benefit the Pension Fund. The program Thursday night will include the Overture to Schumann's "Genoveva," the Beethoven Sixth Symphony ("Pastorale"), the "Spanish Rhadsodie" by Ravel and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Next Saturday night's program in The Shed, under the Munch direction, will comprise the Handel "Water Music"; Bela Bartok's "Music for Strings and Percussion," the Saint-Saens Symphony No. 3 with Organ and the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan." E. Power Biggs of Boston is organist in "Tanglewood."

'Tanglewood on Parade'—

Music Center Will Benefit From Concert

The music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, will share the conducting with three men also familiar to Boston Symphony audiences on Friday evening, Aug. 10, in a special concert held for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. This program will be the feature of "Tanglewood on Parade"; the proceeds are earmarked for the summer school for young musicians maintained at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts.

Friday evening's program will begin with Berlioz' Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," with Eleazar de Carvalho conducting. The concertmaster of the orchestra, Richard Burgin, will conduct the next two works: Bloch's "Nigun" for Violin and Orchestra, and Arbos' "Tango Espagnol." Mr. Burgin's wife, Ruth Posselt, will be soloist in both pieces. Then Leonard Bernstein will play and conduct Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" for Piano and Orchestra.

Following this, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak to the audience briefly, Charles Munch will conduct the closing work of the concert, Debussy's "La Mer."

As in the past, "Tanglewood on Parade" also provides an opportunity for ticket purchasers to attend the activities of the students at the Berkshire Music Center. All departments will be performing varied programs in their specialties after 6 o'clock Friday afternoon. For purchasers of box seats and seats in the reserved sections, the opera department will stage, at 4:30 in the afternoon, a special production of "Amelia Goes to the Ball," by Gian-Carlo Menotti. There will also be waltzing on the lawn, and a door prize, as yet to be announced.

Seats are now available at the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Lenox, Mass.

Music to Be Principal Feature Of Current Week in Berkshires

Seventh Annual Art Show of Thursday Morning Club Is Opened at Berkshire Inn

Music Theme for Week

Music is the theme of the Berkshires for the coming week, for aside from the Tanglewood series, a concert will be given at South Mountain, Pittsfield, Monday afternoon at 4. The Zimbler Sinfonietta, better known as the Budapest Quartet of Stringed Orchestras, and famous for its recordings, will present a special concert on behalf of the United Cerebral Palsy Association of Massachusetts. The Zimbler group is appearing with the co-operation of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and the South Mountain Association. The Sinfonietta is composed of 17 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Joseph Zimbler. Leonard Bernstein, noted conductor, will be soloist.

Berkshire Festival residents interested in the welfare of Berkshire Music Center are co-operating in making the necessary preparations for the Tanglewood on Parade program to be held Friday, Aug. 10. Among those who are assisting with the program are the noted violinist, Albert Spalding of Aston Magna, Great Barrington, and Mrs. Spalding; Mrs. George W. Edman of Pittsfield; Mrs. Donald F. McPherson of Chicago and Pittsfield, Mrs. William Nelson Barrett of Sky Farm, Great Barrington; Miss Annabel Tetrau of Chatham, N. Y., Mrs. Bruce Sanborn of St. Paul, Minn., and Lenox; Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, wife of the late conductor; Mr. and Mrs. J. Herbert Owen of Lenox, Mrs. David Karrick of Stockbridge and Washington, D. C.; Mrs. Anson Phelps Stokes of Lenox, Mrs. C. D. Jackson of New York and Lenox; Mrs. David H. McAlpin of Princeton, N. J., and Stockbridge, and Mrs. Winthrop Emmet, also of Stockbridge.

Strauss Opera Begins Final Week of Berkshire Festival

For its second major production of the 1951 season, the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center will present Richard Strauss' "Ariadene auf Naxos," Monday and Tuesday evenings, conducted by Sarah Caldwell, with staging by Boris Goldovksy and Miss Caldwell.

Three of the roles are double-cast, to enable more students to take part. Leading roles will be sung by James Pease, Mac Morgan, Georgianna Bannister, Marguerite Stagliano, Robert Price, Raymond Smolover, Reid Shelton, Robert Minser, [illegible] Bazinet, Elodie [illegible] Gladys Spector, [illegible] Mesrobian and [illegible].

The final weeks of Berkshire Festival orchestral programs will begin on Thursday with Leonard Bernstein conducting Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Charles Munch will conduct the Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts.

Below are listed the programs for the week.

Thursday at 8:15—Leonard Bernstein conducting. Beethoven: Missa Solemnis (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky). Soloists: Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberta, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; James Pease, bass.

Saturday at 8:15—Beethoven: First Symphony; Honegger: Fifth Symphony; Tchaikovsky: "Pathetic" Symphony.

Sunday at 3—Brahms: Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Second Symphony. Fourth Symphony.

THE MUSIC SHED of the famed Berkshire Music Festival at Lenox, Mass., where Charles Munch, successor to the late Serge Koussevitsky as head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducts this summer.

Charles Munch Leads New Berkshire Festival

By FRANK COLEMAN
Special to The Standard

Lenox, Mass., July 28 — A new Berkshire Music Festival has opened, but for the first time without Serge Koussevitzky, its founder. He died at his summer home on the grounds of Tanglewood June 4.

Charles Munch, successor to Koussevitzky as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and scheduled to make his Berkshire debut this summer, inherited the balance of the concerts and the direction of the Berkshire Music Center as well, in which he has taken an active interest.

The final part of the six week session opened with the first concert of the main series last Thursday in the giant Music Shed, when Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music served as a solemn prelude to the nine concerts of the Boston Symphony. Traditionally on Thursday and Saturday evenings, and on Sunday afternoons, the current week-end opening concerts include Claudio Arrau as soloist in the 2nd Brahms piano concerto, with music of Weber, Prokofieff, Barber, Copland, Schubert and Franck.

Varied Fare

Similar variety marks the balance of the programs, with many important French works on the repertoire. The coming week lists a concert of Schumann, Beethoven, Ravel and Roussel on Thurs., Handel, Bartok, Ravel and Saint-Saens on Sat., and a program conducted by Eleazar de Carvalho next Sunday afternoon, comprised of the second symphony by the fellow Brazilian musician Guarnieri, the second piano concerto of Prokofeiff with the Cuban pianist Jorge Bolet, and the Ravel orchestration of Moussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition, commisioned by Koussevitzky, which the Boston Symphony has always made a remarkable display of tone colour.

A companion Koussevitzky Protege to Carvalho, who is very popular here in the triple role of pianist - composer - conductor, will open the final series of three concerts on Aug. 9 when Leonard Bernstein conducts a memorial performance of Beethoven's great "Missa Solemnis." Munch will conduct the final two concerts, with three symphonies on Aug. 11;— Beethoven's 1st, Honegger's 5th, and Tchaikovsky "Pathetique." The unique Tanglewood-on-Parade will be sandwiched in on the 10th of Aug., with its full gamut of all that Tangelwood can offer, plus fireworks and other more social pleasures.

The final concert Aug. 12 will be an all-Brahms program, consisting of the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, with the 2nd and 4th symphonies.

Concert A Day

Two rarely heard operas will be mounted in new English versions by Boris Goldovsky's opera department; — Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame" which Koussevitzky was to have conducted, and the Richard Strauss work, "Ariadne auf Naxos" performed here some years ago. There will also be smaller works of Stravinsky, Martinu, Mozart and others, and probably an original work by one of the students. Other new music, including Canadian and American compositions, will be heard through the myriad of orchestral concerts, student choirs and ensembles of every kind, lectures, and classes which are open to the public through the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

The 400-odd pupils of the school now in its ninth season, include a dozen Canadians, and Montrealers such as soprano Michele Bonhomme who reached there under a special scholarship, and Pierre Mercure who is working at composition under this year's guest authority, Luigi Dallapiccola. Aaron Copland is the head of the school's administration, and continues his stimulating Composers' Forums where the dissecting of new works is done by public and musicians alike, in the presence of the sometimes hapless composers.

Evergreen Festival

As a full musical holiday, or even for a quick trip to the matchless Berkshire hills of western Massachusetts, the festival remains of strong interest and appeal.

Informality which extends to public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony on Saturday mornings, makes the Berkshire Music Festival one of the most generally popular and successful. Its formula of wide open spaces, coupled to the uncanny acoustics of the Music Shed, leaves room for the largest crowds. Montreal habits of listening to concerts al fresco on the grass, may be fully indulged on Tanglewood's superb lawns.

Koussevitzky's dreams have become realities, and Hawthorne's earlier pleasures in the beauty are now shared by many thousands with each expanding season.

Munch Enlivens Tanglewood With Music by His Countrymen

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The first program of the second and middle week end of the Berkshire Music Festival was pleasantly divided between German and French music. Charles Munch, fulfilling expectations, has brought new and fresh additions to the repertory with music by his countrymen.

Although the third symphony of Albert Roussel was a first time for Tanglewood, it had special relationships with the Boston orchestra. Roussel was commissioned by the late Serge Koussevitzky to write a symphony for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony in 1930. At the same time he was commissioned by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge to write a piece of chamber music and it was for the Coolidge Festival in Chicago in that year that Roussel first came to America, subsequently going to Boston for rehearsals of his symphony.

Also on the program was Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, which proved to be one of the most vivid performances of the evening under Munch's stimulating baton. Ravel and Roussel were contemporaries, just a little older than the generation of French composers which has been represented in different years on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, such as Honegger, Milhaud and Ibert. They are nearer the Debussy epoch in time although there is little, certainly in Roussel, which suggests any contact with his more illustrious countryman. Munch gave both compositions spirit and, in proper places, a pathos which was warm and radiant.

Ravel Well Executed

It has been rather irreverently said that the best Spanish music has not been written by Spaniards. We wouldn't want to discredit this thesis but it can not be denied that Ravel's rhapsody must make any Spaniard proud. The keen orchestration and the fascinating rhythms were expressively brought out last night and the final "Feria" was almost visually suggestive of the April Fair in Seville.

Roussel's symphony is youthful in spirit and lyric, too. He is a master in the writing of orchestral processes. The thematic line seems to lead far and long on slight acquaintance but the instrumental integration in itself was very effective. He gives the concertmaster several eerie passages as solos which Richard Burgin negotiated well without forcing.

For the first half of the program there had been the beloved and familiar Pastoral symphony of Beethoven and the welcome rarity, the overture to Schumann's "Genoveva." This was an excellent starter to the evening and Munch made the introduction eloquent and graphic. It seemed to get unduly noisy as he proceeded and some of the demands the conductor made resulted in shifting of orchestral balances.

More Work for Orchestra?

The Beethoven sixth symphony has been programmed many times at Tanglewood. We have allowed our fantasy to run wild at times and even to suggest, that Beethoven thought not only of the Berkshires when he wrote it but even, more specifically, of Tanglewood. The symphony is surely a welcome part of any program and it was good to hear another reading, such as Munch gave it. It seems to us that some of the more standard and familiar pieces of the orchestral repertory are sometimes sacrificed in rehearsal time to the less familiar and more rarely played numbers. The unusually heavy demands of preparing three complete programs a week would almost make it necessary to divide the [illegible] in favor of those works which do not require familiarization. The resultant reliance on past experience in the case of the best-known works therefore shows up in cutey readings of the classics. An orchestra becomes thus the victim of its own schedule, and probably nothing can be done about it but work the musicians longer hours, a suggestion for which we hardly expect thanks.

Mr. Munch will conduct tomorrow evening's concert and Sunday afternoon Eleazar de Carvalho will preside with the assistance of the French pianist, Jorge Bolet.

FOUR TO CONDUCT SPECIAL CONCERT AT TANGLEWOOD

Munch to Share Duties Friday; Mrs. Roosevelt Will Speak Briefly

Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 4—The music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, will share the conducting with three men also familiar to Boston Symphony audiences, next Friday evening in a special concert held for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. This program will be the feature of Tanglewood on Parade, and the proceeds are earmarked for the summer school for young musicians maintained at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts.

Friday evening's program will begin with Berlioz overture, "Benvenuto Cellini", with Eleazar de Carvalho conducting. The concertmaster of the orchestra, Richard Burgin, will conduct the next two works: Bloch's Nigun, for violin and orchestra; and Arbos' Tango Espagnol. Mr. Burgin's wife, who has established her name as a concert violinist—Ruth Posselt—will be soloist in both pieces. Then Leonard Bernstein will play and conduct Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue, for piano and orchestra. Following this, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, a good friend of Tanglewood, will speak to the audience briefly. Charles Munch will conduct the closing work of the concert, Debussy's La Mer, (The Sea), three orchestral sketches.

As in the past, Tanglewood on Parade also provides an opportunity for ticket purchasers to attend the activities of the students at the Berkshire Music Center. All departments will be performing varied programs in their specialties after 6 p. m. Friday. And for purchasers of box seats and seats in the reserved sections, the opera department will stage, at 4:30 p. m. a special production of "Amelia Goes To The Ball", by Gian-Carlo Memotti. There will also be waltzing on the lawn, and a door prize, as yet to be announced.

Box seats are available at the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Lenox and cost $5; seats in the reserved section cost $4, and seats in the unreserved section of the Shed are $2.50.

Works of 10 Music 'Greats' On Program

Ten composers whose works spell out more than two centuries of great music, will be represented in the three Berkshire Festival concerts this [illegible] Music Shed at Tanglewood, Mass.

Charles Munch will lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two of these concerts, on Thursday and Saturday evenings. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct next Sunday afternoon, with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist on part of that program.

Thursday evening's program will include Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva, Beethoven's Pastorale Symphony (No. 6), Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, and Roussel's Third Symphony.

The Saturday evening program will begin with the Water Music Suite by Handel, followed by Bela Bartok's Music for Strings and Peruccion, Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe Suite No. 2 and Saint-Saen's Symphony No. 3 with organ.

Next Sunday afternoon's concert will find Eleaszer de Carvalho as guest conductor in a program featuring Jorge Bolet as soloist in Prokofieff's Piano Concert No. 2. The remainder of the program will consist of Guarnieri's Second Symphony and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," with orchestration by Ravel.

Reserved seats for these concerts are available at the festival ticket office. General admission to the grounds is sold on the day of each concert.

By Arthur Berger

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3.—Albert Roussel's third symphony, heard here at Tanglewood last night under the direction of Charles Munch, injected an element of freshness into a well organized list otherwise assembled from traditional literature.

The Roussel symphony was one of the works written for the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it celebrated its fiftieth anniversary in 1930. Though this orchestra revives it from time to time, the work has been surprisingly slow in finding a niche for itself, more generally in the repertory of our orchestras. It is music that operates effectively on more than one level, since it has a brightness and immediate appeal that earned an enthusiastic reception from last night's audience, along with ingenuity and economy to engage those who analyze music closely and scrutinize it for the lasting virtues.

A five-note motif, contemporary in its shape, effectively integrates the symphony, and the jazz contours so fascinating to French composers of the '20s are incorporated in a way that gives them perspective and breadth. The motoric element characteristic of our time assumes rather special shape in Roussel's style, and it is particularly in the foreground in the first movement, where the beat is often as commanding as the chug-chug of a locomotive.

There are also cheerful passages of divertimento character and tender evocations of the "blues," the latter notably in the slow movement, the most affecting of the four parts. Dissonant devices, including polytonal ones, are present, but their impact is absorbed and somehow softened by the fullness of texture. The work is pleasurable, compact and often arresting.

The program also included Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Beethoven's "pastorale" symphony and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole." It was in the last of these that the conducting skill of Mr. Munch showed up best. This is one of the French compositions he has obviously worked out thoroughly and perceptively. When one hears him conduct in this vein his accomplishments are very impressive indeed, though he is likely to be a bit erratic in music that has not become so integral a part of his musical experience.

Opera Thrives as Music Gets Visual Dimension

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

WE ARE NOT so different from other folks. This community long since manifested its preference for a dish of opera. We have been richly served, both out of standard repertory and from the chamber opera cuisine. It has been easy to think that all this was a specialty of the house, so to speak, and that the taste was locally cultivated.

Not when you take a broad sweeping view over the land, as does the gifted H. W. Heinsheimer, rather recently come among us from the musical world across the Atlantic, where he was active in the field of publishing and critical commentary. He will be remembered as the author of a breezy book entitled "Menagerie in F Sharp," which proved that a sense of humor does not preclude taking the subject of music seriously. Just now he has written an article for Musical Quarterly called "Opera in America Today."

Mr. Heinsheimer apparently has surveyed every place except Hartford, but before quarreling with him let us look at some of the encouraging things he has to say.

After citing the tremendous impetus which radio gave to music in America, Mr. Heinsheimer no s the regrettable decline in symphonic offerings over the air waves, but adds that with television "a vast, radical transformation is in the making as the eye as well as the ear becomes engaged . . . . . This time, a new interest in and a new approach to the visible side of music—the musical theater, opera, and ballet — are plainly evident. Again it is an explosive, rapidly spreading development and one that cannot be explained through patterns of the past or through accepted forms of traditional operatic life."

SUMMED UP, operatic activity the country over is impressive. The high spots: Juilliard—Dallapiccola's "The Prisoner," "The Beggar's Opera"; Columbia — "a firmly established tradition of presenting new American works"; Mannes Music School—Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge"; Carnegie Tech—"Figaro"; Lyric Theater of Karamu House in Cleveland—50 performances of a Carl Orff opera and 100 of Weill's "Lost in the Stars," also Stravinsky's "Histoire du Soldat" and Gluck's "Caravan to Mecca." Bob Jones U.—"Ernani"; San Antonio — "Tristan," "Figaro," "Rosenkavalier"; Southern California — "Ariadne au Naxos"; University of Indiana —an English "Parsifal."

Other performances, given commercially or sponsored by symphony orchestras, include Berg's "Wozzeck," Busoni's "Arlecchino," Schoenberg's "Erwartung," Monteverdi's "Orfeo," Strauss' "Salome" and commercial productions such as New York City Center and touring repertory companies.

The theme of Mr. Heinsheimer's article is the opportunity which this resurgence offers to composers. He writes: "At my desk, where an ever-increasing flood of requests for new material is received from all these workshops, opera guilds, college groups, little theaters, 'opera intimes,' 'Co-op' opera groups, etc., it becomes apparent that an essential, if not the most important, part in the rapidly unfolding drama is reserved to the composers and writers of America. . . . It is up to the American composer and writer to give sense and direction to the new decentralized operatic movement."

THE PIONEER activity of the Julius Hartt Musical Foundation in this sphere is so well known here as to require no repetition. The absolutely unique record of the Connecticut Opera Association in producing repertory opera on a sound financial basis, without subsidy or public gratuity, gives Hartford an important part in this movement which should not be overlooked.

It is gratifying to know, however, that the enlightened state of opera in Hartford is not parochial but part of a very bright nation-wide picture.

Tanglewood Patrons Will Hear Music Written for Out-of-Doors

Eagle-Aug 5

TANGLEWOOD — The Water Music, with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, will open tomorrow evening's Berkshire Festival concert at Tanglewood, was written by George Handel to be played out of doors. In Handel's time parties on the Thames were a favorite recreation of Londoners in the summer season. Hired boats and private barges cruised up and down the river to the tune of music. For the first time, in this piece, Handel used the French horn, which was at that time regarded as an instrument for fanfare, and too coarse for symphonic music. It was probably composed and performed in parts between 1715 and 1717.

Bela Bartok, a Hungarian, wrote the Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, at Budapest in 1936. A pianist, composer and teacher, he was a student of Hungarian folklore. He wrote many pieces with Hungarian peasant themes.

Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe," Suite No. 2, will be played for the first time at Tanglewood with chorus. A ballet in one act, it was commissioned by Serge de Diaghileff, director of the Ballet Russe. The plot was by Michel Fokine, the choreographer of the troupe. The composer wrote, "My intention in writing it was to compose a vast musical fresco, less scrupulous as to archaism than faithful to the Greece of my dreams, which inclined readily enough to what French artists of the late 18th century have imagined and depicted. The story is from ancient Greece.

The Saint-Saens symphony in C minor, No. 3, was written for the London Philharmonic Society and first performed in 1886 by its symphony orchestra under the composer's direction. Born in Algiers, the composer began to study piano at the age of five and to compose at six. In 1852 he won the grand Prix de Rome and continued to win prizes, to compose and to write on musical and even scientific subjects, as he was an ardent student of astronomy.

Tickets are on sale at the box office, Tanglewood, England Brothers, Pittsfield, and the Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge. Last night's concert drew 7400 patrons.

Tomorrow morning at 10 the orchestra will hold a public rehearsal for the benefit of its pension fund.

In the afternoon at 3, E. Power Biggs, the organist, will play a recital whose numbers will include:

Noel Grand Jeu et Duo ..... Daquin
Sonata No. 2 ..... Hindemith
Litanies ..... Alain
Variations on a Noel ..... Marcel Dupre

The recital will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center whose contributions help to support the school.

Tanglewood Triumphs Over Adversity

World Telegram + Sun August 4

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 4.—The performance given Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame" in the Theater-Concert Hall at Tanglewood last Monday evening was, in a way, a triumph over adversity. You will remember that Serge Koussevitsky, scheduled to conduct the work, was suddenly taken from mundane activity, thus leaving the musical supervision entirely in the hands of his aids.

It would have been an interesting experience to observe his stick work with an opera, an art in which he had not been altogether unpracticed. But we were deprived of that, and the loss is undoubtedly ours.

Goldovsky Praised.

Boris Goldovsky, who did conduct the work, besides being its stage director, the translator of the libretto and general esthetic factotum, did well, indeed, with an orchestra which, though adequate, was far from the equal of previous student aggregations at the Berkshire Music Center.

I was glad of the opportunity to hear this piece, which had not been given in New York since 1940, I believe. I enjoyed it then, and I enjoyed it at Tanglewood. It is an excitingly dramatic work, often melodically folkish, in the Tschaikowsky manner, which is to say that the folkishness is probably very good imitation, yet not entirely based on actual sources.

There are excellent arias, one by Pauline, Lisa's friend, which she sings seated at the piano on stage. There is a completely fine duet between Lisa and Hermann in the second scene of the third act, there are engaging orchestral sequences throughout.

Rhapsodic Score.

It is a rhapsodic score Tschaikowsky wrote, as I previously remarked, and a score expressive of elemental passions among the higher circles of Czaristic Russia. Hence, it would seem that the delivery of the music by the singers should be consistent with those dramatic factors.

Young singers, student singers, for all their superior musical training at such a place as the Berkshire Music Center, may not be expected to conduct themselves with the savoir faire of the seasoned, the polished trouper in opera. Yet there are student singers and student singers, and there have been times when one or even two in a cast of trainees did come up to emotional, as well as musical expectations.

I wish that this could be said of the youngsters so earnestly trying to fulfill their vocal-histrionic obligations in this performance. There was neatness of style, phrase-tuning in good taste. Nor could one object to the animation they demonstrated. But with all that, the central fire was lacking in their contributions.

Speaks of Students.

I speak, of course, of the purely student members of the cast, for that, as you are aware, did hold several professional artists in the persons, for example, of the wonderfully poised James Pease, dependable David Lloyd.

In saying all this, I wish it understood that no amount of praise could be enough for the very serious, dedicated work of the young singers. Critical standards for the professional are not being applied here, though the Berkshire Music Center's opera department has consistently in the past come up with quite finished productions, and most worthy of such treatment.

Koussevitzky Honored at Tanglewood

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., July 27.—The symphonic part of the Berkshire Music Festival began last evening in the orchestra shed at Tanglewood, and will continue for the next three Thursday-to-Sunday weekends.

Yesterday would have been the 77th birthday of Serge Koussevitzky, had he lived long enough to open this year's musical proceedings at this shrine which he, in great part, helped to create. Replacing him, however, was Charles Munch, the present regular conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Silent Tribute.

Promptly at 8:30 p. m., Mr. Munch appeared on stage, faced the audience of over 7000 and said, "The 'Funeral Music' (Mozart's Masonic 'Funeral Music') is played in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. We ask that you do not applaud at its conclusion, and that you will remain standing in silence for a few moments."

Thus began the 14th Berkshire Symphonic Festival. The music, composed following the demise of two companion Freemasons of his, the Duke Georg August von Mecklenberg-Strelitz and Franz Count Esterhazy von Galantha, is appropriately elegiac. And last evening it was performed with what I thought was an unusual amount of sympathy and devotion.

Scarcely Typical.

The regular part of the concert started with the Fourth Symphony of Schumann. Of this I had expected from Mr. Munch something special in the way of interpretation, a finesse that is too often lacking from renderings of the work, a lightness or, better perhaps, buoyant feeling.

These qualities did emerge at odd corners of the pattern, though they were scarcely typical of what, maybe mistakenly, I sought. Instead, there was the heavy hand, the almost Brahmsian bigness, the stodgy processional of musical material.

The musical prize of the evening was the delivery of the Berlioz "Fantastic" Symphony, which seems to be getting a play around the symphonic circuit these summer days.

Nowhere in this composition did Mr. Munch or the valiant men of the Boston symphony, fail to communicate. It was a whole poem of projection and, as you might expect, acceptance by the enthralled listeners.

Was Scintillating.

This music, brought into being by Berlioz's mad passion for the Shakespearean actress Harriet Smithson, is something on the order of a pre-Feudian larrup in the middle dream world, if we are to take seriously the programmatic idea Berlioz thought up for it.

I find it much easier to listen to without the literary scenario, and perhaps strangely the music does convey much that is macabre, demoniac, inflammatory, and the rest of the business.

The performance was one that I cannot describe in any other way than scintillating. We all know how well this orchestra can play, when the conditions warrant. Well, they warranted last night, and the cheers and noisy handclapping by the audience proved more than words can that they did.

6,400 Attend Tanglewood Opening

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 9—Two all-Bach programs yesterday afternoon and Saturday night opened the 1951 summer concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

A record-breaking 6,400 persons, 1,000 more than the number who attended last year's opening week end, saw Charles Munch make his debut as new music director for the Berkshire Festival. The French conductor has directed the Boston Symphony for two full seasons, but had never conducted at Tanglewood.

Saturday night, Mr. Munch dedicated the final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew," to his predecessor, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. It is the first in a series of memorial concerts scheduled by the orchestra and by the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, the symphony's school founded by Dr. Koussevitsky.

Mme. Koussevitsky slipped into a side seat in the little Theater-Concert Hall in time to hear Mr. Munch offer the choral selection for "the great leader, the great master, the creator of the Berkshire Music Center." The entire audience stood for a moment in silent tribute as the chorus finished.

The Festival Chorus, a student ensemble directed by Hugh Ross, almost took the spotlight from the orchestra in both opening performances. The powerful young voices were magnificent in the lusty music of "Der Zufriedengstellte Aeolus," (Aeolus Pacified), Bach's secular cantata. Soloists with the group were Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass.

Programs for the week end also included the Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 6, the Concerti in C major and D minor for three pianos and strings, and the choral "Magnificat," in D major. Trio pianists were Irving Fine, Ralph Barkowitz and Bernard Zighera.

Haydn and Mozart programs will be given over the next two week ends for the "little season" which precedes the major festival works by the full orchestra.

Cellist Steals Performance At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 16 —The works of Joseph Haydn, represented by four symphonies, a sinfonie concertante for winds and strings, the D major Piano Concerto and a superb interpretation of the violoncello Concerto in D major, were offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end.

The all-Haydn programs followed last week's Bach concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall. Next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon the orchestra will devote itself to music by Mozart, in the third week-end of "Little" concerts opening the 11th year of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

Gregor Piatigorsky, a rollicking, exuberant giant who came onstage swinging his cello as if it were a violin, was soloist yesterday. He drew an unprecedented burst of applause from the audience after the sustained solo passage by the cello in the exposition of the concerto, and from there on, set his own pace for Charles Munch and the orchestra to follow.

Piano soloist for Saturday night's concert was Seymour Lipkin, 24-year-old New Yorker who is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. His playing of the three-part concerto was brilliant, particularly moving in the tender, meloci second movement.

Of the four symponies offered, No. 88, No. 104 ("London,") No. 103 ("The Drum Roll,") and No. 101 ("The Clock,") the 88th was perhaps the warmest, although the tempo of the opening two movements seemed a trifle too restrained by comparison with the full, robust treatment of its minuet and final.

Visitors to Tanglewood will often find that some of the most stimulating music comes not from the professional perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but from the numberless student groups whose recitals are open to supporting members, "Friends," of the Music Center. Yesterday morning, young musicians of the orchestral department gave a program of chamber music in the open-sided Chamber Music Hall. Opera Department students list a program for tomorrow night, the student orchestra gives a Shed concert Friday, while another chamber music recital will again be given Sunday morning.

'Little Concert' Series Ends At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 23 — Three week-ends of music for small orchestra by the Boston Symphony at its Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood concluded yesterday, with two Mozart programs winding up the six-concert series.

Year by year, this "little concert" series preliminary to the major festival programs grows more popular, with attendance far exceeding the 1,200-seat capacity of the Theater-Concert Hall. Thousands of listeners spread acres of blankets over the lush green lawns, clad in such informal comfort that not even the threat of rain discouraged them yesterday.

Charles Munch made his bow at Tanglewood for the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series this season, and apparently has met the critical demands of audiences who would inevitably compare him with his predecessor, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, father of the Festival.

Few Revisions

With few revisions, he is following the program schedule which Dr. Koussevitsky had arranged for himself.

In the programs Saturday night and yesterday afternoon, Mr. Munch drew wonderful, tender music from his orchestra, the combination of Mozart and the Boston Symphony's strings being always a happy one.

The melodic Symphony in E-flat major was beautifully done, as was the brief Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra. Also on Saturday night's program was Mozart's Missa Brevis in F-major, with Hugh Ross conducting the Festival Chorus. Gladys Spector, new soprano soloist with the choral group, has a full, powerful and distinguished voice. Other soloists already known to Tanglewood audiences were Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

William Kroll was soloist yesterday in the A-major violin concerto.

Mr. Munch will conduct the first of the major concerts for full orchestra in the Tanglewood Shed at 8:15 p. m. Thursday. The program includes Schumann's Fourth Symphony; Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony; and Mozart's Funeral Music, which will be dedicated to Dr. Koussevitsky.

7,000 Enjoy Tanglewood Shed Festival

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 27—Diplomatic and musical notables attracted almost as much attention as did the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, at the first of the Berkshire Music Festival's major summer concerts in the vast Tanglewood Shed.

It was more than merely a celebrity-studded opening night, however, for an audience of more than 7,000 heard a stirring performance of the imaginative "Fantastic Symphony" by Berlioz, long to be remembered by admirers of Charles Munch, new conductor of the orchestra. The violent contrasts in the Berlioz music were heightened by Mr. Munch's orchestration, which brought out all the color, fire and grisly humor of this symphony.

Dedicated To Founder

The program, first in a series of nine Festival concerts for the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened with the resonant Masonic Funeral Music by Mozart. Dedicating this to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, founder of the Berkshire Music Center and conductor of the orchestra for a quarter-century, Mr. Munch asked the listeners not to applaud, but to stand in tribute at the finish of the number. Yesterday would have been Dr. Koussevitsky's 77th birthday.

Also played last night was Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, a vigorous, melodic composition which the took the orchestra in swift transition from sensitive airs for strings to the brassy insistance of a triumphant finale.

Last night's audience included Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt; the French ambassador, Henri Bonnet, and his stately wife; Mme. Koussevitsky, dramatically clad in a long black cape; and the young composer-conductor, Leonard Bernstein, long a protege of Dr. Koussevitsky, who now directs the Music Center School.

Cool Weather Chills Crowd At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 3 — Cool weather yesterday, with almost autumnal chill after sundown, cut anticipated attendance last night for the 10th program of the 1951 Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

Plenty of seats were available in the lofty Music Shed at concert time. However, the hardy souls swathed in blankets, topcoats and heavy wool sweaters, listening from the spacious lawns, raised audience figures to a respectable 7,600.

Charles Munch, who has directed all the festival concerts so far this season, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra again last night. His two-part program went from the classic lyricism of Schumann and Beethoven before intermission, to the cacophonic frenzy of Ravel and Roussel as the concert closed.

Opening with Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and the familiar, beloved "Pastorale" of Beethoven, Mr. Munch brilliantly displayed the orchestra's famed string section.

It was in Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G minor, though, that he reached the evening's peak. No soothing soporifics, their stimulation and excitement were powerfully conveyed to the audience.

The week-end concert series continues tomorrow night, when Mr. Munch will conduct music by Handel, Bartok, Raxel and Saint-Saens, and Sunday afternoon, with Eleazar de Carvalho taking over as conductor.

Announcement has been made of the program for "Tanglewood on Parade," the annual musical jamboree arranged as a benefit for the Berkshire Music Center. With events starting at 6 p. m. next Friday, the program will offer direction by Tanglewood's three resident conductors, Mr. Munch, Mr. de Carvalho and Leonard Bernstein, with Concertmaster Richard Burgin also conducting. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak, and activities are scheduled by all departments of the Music Center.

Tanglewood Concerts Draw Large Crowds

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 30—Undaunted by rain Saturday night, or the prospect of more rain yesterday afternoon, audiences estimated at 18,500 heard the second and third programs of the 1951 Festival concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood this week end.

The two programs covered the range from the singing beauty of Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C Minor to the violent, controversial Sixth Symphony, in E-flat Minor, by Prokofieff.

However the critics may debate its interpretation, the powerful performance of Cesar Francks' D Minor Symphony, closing yesterday afternoon's program, completely won the thousands of listeners who heard it. Charles Munch, directing the orchestra, gave it the richness and depth this sole symphony of Franck's deserves.

Claudio Arrau, Chilean - born pianist, was soloist Saturday night in the Brahms B-flat Major concerto. The Saturday program opened with Weber's "Oberon" overture.

Two contemporary composers, whose works represent the only American compositions on the festival schedule this season, heard their music played yesterday. They were Samuel Barber and Aaron Copeland, both introduced to the audience by Mr. Munch. Yesterday's music opened with Mr. Barber's sparkling overture to Sheridan's "School for Scandal," and Mr. Copeland's fantasy, "Quiet City," for trumpet, English horn and strings. Roger Voisin was trumpet soloist, while Louis Speyer was soloist on the English horn, an instrument little heard in solo performance.

The Berkshire Music Center's opera department tonight will present the seldom-offered Tschaikowsky opera, "Pique Dame," (Queen of Hearts), in a limited performance at the Theater - Concert Hall.

By Arthur Berger

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 5.—Charles Munch shared this week end's concerts of the Berkshire Festival with the first of his two guest conductors, Eleazor de Carvalho. Mr. Carvalho, who first came to our attention as a conductor here at Tanglewood some time ago, is a familiar figure to the audiences that congregate here annually in the spacious shed and on the lawns behind it, and the program he conducted this afternoon was drawn from familiar repertory.

The concert was to be the occasion for the performance of a new symphony by Carmago Guarnieri. Mr. Carvalho's Brazilian fellow countryman. But this scheduled premiere, anticipated with much interest, was unfortunately canceled owing to delay in the arrival of the orchestral parts. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and "Death and Transfiguration" were put in its place. Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto, with Jorge Bolet as soloist, and the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition" completed the list.

It was last night's concert under Mr. Munch's direction that thus provided the subject matter for discussion as far as repertory is concerned. The contemporary work was Bartok's Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, one of the recognised masterpieces of our century. There was also a nineteenth-century work, the Saint-Saens Symphony in C Minor, that is not often heard, and even so well known a work as Ravel's Second Suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" was given an uncommon twist through the use of the chorus normally left out in concert renditions.

The discussions occasioned by this list received strong competition from universal comment on the very cool weather, which made women's furs and men's top-coats much in evidence last night.

Listeners coming from other parts, provided they were prepared for the weather, had reason to welcome the temperature and clearness that went with it, and the attendance, officially reported as about 10,000, exceeded any of the previous figures this season. This afternoon there were sunshine and pleasant conditions for listening. The estimated attendance was given out as somewhat less than last night.

The Raval work did not seem to gain much last night in concert form from the presence of the wailing chorus, but the music rose to a compelling climax under Mr. Munch's direction. This is patently one of Mr. Munch's pieces, and so is the Saint-Saens, which received a thoroughly devoted reading. The academic but ever so craftsman-like procedures of the symphony showed up particularly well, since the varied melodic devices, developments and fugues were precisely what were needed after the atmospheric music and effects of the Ravel and Bartok. The reading of the Bartok was tentative and made it seem longer than it is. Here, and in Handel's "Water Music," which opened the program, Mr. Munch did not seem at ease and in the utmost control. In the French works, by contrast, he was completely absorbed, even carried away at times, in a way that is quite uncommon for our top-rank conductors. He is likely to become a bit wild, a bit germanic, at tension points. But it is wholly without artifice. Climaxes that verge on being pushed too strenuously are redeemed by what seems to be an absence of the usual attempt to put on a show. A certain breadth and grandness are present in a rather special way in Mr. Munch's conducting.

Mr. Carvalho is noticeably more experienced and in command of resources these days, but qualities of distinction are still absent, and the music rarely attains loftiness under his baton. Even with the Guarnieri the shape of his program would have been without real contrasts and proper balance. With the Strauss in its place, there were many brassy moments and too much of the drama on which Mr. Carvalho seems to thrive. There was also a tendency to stretch out slow passages. Mr. Bolet's strong fingers made the piano part of the Prokofieff carry very well outdoors. But there was not much subtlety in his performance.

Boston Symphony Is in Good Hands

For sheer musicianship, there has been no superior conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood than Charles Munch who is this season's permanent conductor during the Berkshire Music Festival.

It is natural that Mr. Munch should be compared with his predecessor, the immortal Serge Koussevitsky, and it is also natural that some would be apprehensive about Mr. Munch following so colorful a director as Koussevitsky. Thus the critical eyes of musicians, music critics, and the thousands of semi-critics who comprise the audience at Tanglewood were necessarily upon Mr. Munch. The big question was this: how would he compare?

During some of the early concerts in the theater-concert hall, when only the small orchestra appeared, there was some apprehension. No one is qualified to say just what was wrong, but in two of the early concerts, the conductor and two sections of the orchestra weren't quite synchronized. This condition existed for only a measure or two. But the apprehension was firmly rooted.

The happy report now, however, is that any doubts about how Mr. Munch will handle the Boston Symphony Orchestra can be safely forgotten. In the first of the shed concerts — working with the full orchestra — Mr. Munch proved his greatness. Never has an audience at Tanglewood seen such superb cueing. Never has it seen such remarkable musicianship in a director. And as for color — Mr. Munch has all the color necessary. His is a different temperament than that of his predecessor; but he is no less talented, no less well-trained and he will make for himself an enormous reputation in the United States.

MUSIC

By Miles Kastendieck

THOUGH Tchaikowsky's symphonic and ballet music is very well known, his operas have apparently waned in popularity. Of his 11 works in this form, only "Eugene Onegin" and "Pique Dame" have survived. Even these have been almost superseded by the operas of other Russian composers.

Over 40 years have passed since "Pique Dame" had its Metropolitan premiere; over 30 since "Eugene Onegin" received its first Metropolitan mounting. "Onegin" received seven performances in two seasons. Tchaikowsky did not gain any security in the favor of New York operagoers.

Revivals of both works in recent years suggest that they are not destined to be completely forgotten. One of the New Opera Company's most successful productions was that of "Pique Dame." The New York City Opera Company may be credited for resuscitating "Eugene Onegin." The production of "Pique Dame" by the students of the Berkshire Music Center this last week is, therefore, of more than passing interest.

LESS well-known, "Pique Dame" or "The Queen of Spades" may be well worth cultivating. In the English translation by Boris Goldovsky it disclosed itself as a piece of musical theatre full of atmosphere and potential excitement.

The work has enough dramatic or melodramatic qualities to fuse with its lyricism and make possible a first-class production. Perhaps its elaborate scenic demands of seven sets have proved a handicap in its recreation, but the lavish simplicity of the Tanglewood production showed what can be done when the spirit is willing.

This is not the first time that the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center has made a definite contribution toward operatic enterprise. The performance of "The Queen of Spades" last Monday night took two acts to get underway, but the third act caught fire.

With all the impetus of Tchaikowsky's gift and all the facilities of modern opera production, it suggested what might be done under professional auspices. Serge Koussevitzky's desire to produce the work and Mr. Goldovsky's achievement in bringing it to fruition resulted in a most stimulating achievement.

TANGLEWOOD — The second program of this week-end's Berkshire Festival concerts will be held tonight at 8.15 in the Tanglewood Music Shed, when Charles Munch will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the following program:

Water Music ..... Handel
Music for Strings and Percussion . Bartok
Daphnis and Chloe, with chorus, prepared by Hugh Ross ..... Ravel
Symphony No. 3 with organ . Saint Saens

Eleazar deCarvalho will conduct the orchestra tomorrow afternoon at Tanglewood in the sixth concert of the Festival. A Brazilian of Dutch and pure Indian parentage, he was a conducting pupil of Serge Koussevitzky, and for several years has been his assistant in the conducting department of the Berkshire Music Center. He has been guest conductor of the orchestra at Tanglewood and at Symphony Hall, Boston.

Tomorrow's program will be:

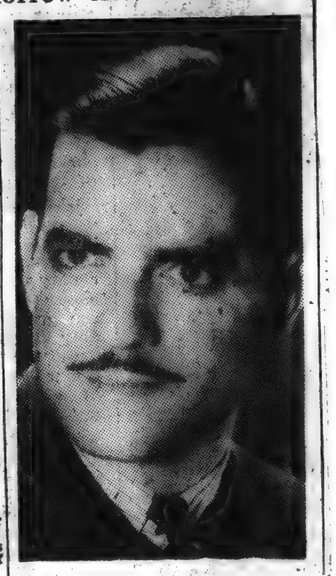
Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
"Death and Transfiguration," symphonic poem ..... Richard Strauss
Piano Concerto in G minor .... Prokofieff
Jorge Bolet, soloist
"Pictures at an Exhibition," pianoforte pieces arranged for orchestra by Maurice Ravel ..... Moussorgsky

"Euryanthe" was Carl Maria vonWeber's longest opera, which he completed in 1823, for performance in October, 1823, in Vienna. He wrote his wife, "My reception, when I appeared in the orchestra, was the most enthusiastic and brilliant one that one could imagine. There was no end to it."

"Death and Transfiguration," one of three symphonic poems that Richard Strauss wrote within three years, appeared about 1886, when the composer was 22 years of age. The others were "Macbeth," and "Don Juan."

Composed in 1912, Prokofieff's second concerto was first performed in 1913 at Pavlovsk, near St. Petersburg, with the composer in the solo part and Aslanov conducting. The score was lost when Prokofieff came to America in 1918, and he re-wrotes it in 1923 from piano sketches which had been saved in Russia by his mother. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the revised version in Paris in 1924, with the composer at the piano and again with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1930. When performed, it caused considerable commotion in music circles.

Jorge Bolet, who will play the piano solo, was born in Havana and received his principal musical education at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia. Following graduation he toured Europe and returned to the United States to win the Naumburg award, which carries with it the privilege of a Town Hall recital. An infantry officer World War II, he was assgned as assistant military attaché to the Cuban embassy in Washington. He made his debut as a pianist when during the war a performance of an orchestra was delayed in Constitution Hall. Since his discharge from the Army he has toured Mexico, Central America, the West Indies and South America and the North American Continent, appearing with major orchestras and winning the Josef Hofmann award. Tomorrow he will appear for the first time with the Boston Orchestra.



Jorge Bolet

Moussorgsky composed his suite of piano pieces in 1874. The first performance of the orchestration made by Ravel was in Paris at a "Koussevitzky concert." Dr. Koussevitzky first played the suite at the Boston Symphony concerts the following year.

The chamber music students of the Berkshire Music Center will give a concert tomorrow at 10, with the Quintet in C major by Boccherini, the String Quartet No. 2 by Bartok, Mozart's Quartet No. 1 in G minor for piano, violin, viola and violoncello and the adagio from Quartet No. 3 by Arnold Schoenberg, in memory of the composer, who died three weeks ago in Los Angeles.

Tickets for the Festival concerts are on sale at the box office, including admission to the grounds, from which hundreds listen. Picnic parties are welcome before the concerts and after the Sunday performances. Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose contributions are devoted to the support of the school, are admitted to all student events, including the Sunday morning chamber music.

Tanglewood Concerts Draw Week-End 20,000

Final Series B Presentations More Nearly at Standards Of Previous Offerings

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, Aug. 5—The two final concerts in the Series B concerts played here at Tanglewood this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra more nearly reached the standards of previous Tanglewood concerts than any we have heard thus far. More than 20,000 people were present last night and this afternoon to enjoy some really thrilling interpretations and performances.

Only Appearance

This afternoon the conductor was Eleazar De Carvalho, making his only appearance as conductor this summer. He showed a remarkable interpretive growth over last year and conducted with a dignity and musical insight which we had not noted heretofore. He opened the program with a sturdy, forthright reading of the overture to "Euryanthe" by Von Weber. This is another opera known chiefly for its overture. It is tuneful music throughout, with a delicate tracery of melody contrasted to the solid brilliance of the greater portion of the overture.

For this listener, at least, the high point of the concert was the performance of "Death and Transfiguration," for us, at least, the most rewarding of the Strauss tone poems. Mr. Carvalho revealed unsuspected spirituality in his reading of the work. It was a reading rich in detail, color and contrast. The Boston players were at their superb best. There are those who feel that only a conductor of matur age, long experience and deep sensitivity can interpret this work. Mr. Carvalho is young, exuberant and a fine interpreter of the moderns, but he revealed this afternoon an inner power which permitted a splendid reading of a great work."

"Boring As Usual"

I found Prokofieff's "Piano concerto in G Minor, No. 2" as flash and boring as usual, even though it was played in true virtuoso style by pianist Jorge Bolet. Mr. Carvalho and the orchestra provided a sumptuous accompaniment and there were moments of excitement, but there were also times when thoughts of a child drumming on a piano were hard to prevent. That this concerto created something of a turmoil in Russia in 1913 is not surprising, and, in the light of Prokofieff's mature achievements, it may well be that he was suffering from growing pains when he wrote this work.

The program concluded with a superior performance of "Pictures at an Exhibition." The Ravel arrangement was used. Dr. Koussevitzky made this score known in Paris in 1923 and in Boston in 1924. Written originally for the piano, "Pictures at an Exhibition" grow immeasurably in interest as Ravel's amazing score is unfolded.

Mr. Carvalho read the score with keen insight as to the various moods created. There was laughter from the audience over the conversation between "Samuel Goldberg and Schmuyle". We found the long crescendo and diminuendo which portrays the passing of a wagon particularly well conceived in "Cattle at Sandomierz." The final "Gates of Kiev" was played in a grandoise spirit rivaling in intensity the coronation scene from "Boris Godounoff." It was a fitting conclusion to an exhilarating concert.

Tanglewood Attire Still Less Than Formal

Lenox, Aug. 5—The twelfth program which concludes the B Series of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood drew some 9500 music lovers. Conducting was the popular Eleazar De Carvalho, the Brazilian who has become widely known and liked throughout this area since joining the faculty of the music center under the late Serge Koussevitzky.

225 UN Guests

In the vast audience this afternoon were 225 members of the UN secretariat staff members, week end guests in Berkshire homes. This custom of entertaining the workers from many lands was established a year ago and expanded this season. Also present were 40 foreign students who are attending Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Notwithstanding the gentle hint handed out by Tanglewood officials on Thursday night by offering wraparound skirts to women garbed in slacks and the like, there were far too many noted on the lawns and in the vast shed who were what might be termed extremely informal in their dress.

Wore Blue Overalls

At one recall a young miss was noted in the aisle applauding madly. She was snappily attired in blue overalls rolled to the knees, a checkered shirt and was barefoot. This was one of the extremities, but there were hundreds other who, it would seem, started off for a day at Coney Island rather than the refinements of Tanglewood.

As a matter of fact, a large numbr of firmer concert devotees were noted on the veranda of the country club of Pittsfield enjoying the finals of the 32d annual invitation tournament rather than coming here to the Sunday afternoon program. More and more music lovers are becoming openly disgusted with what they see on the lawns in front of the music shed here.

Last night, the attendance figure nearly reached 11,000 and although this afternoon some 9500 were within the grounds there were an exceedingly great number of vacant seats within the shed.

Boston Symphony Flashily Brilliant

AUG 3 1951

About 3,000 persons of Tanglewood's usual audience were missing last night in Lenox, Mass., as somewhere 7,000 turned out to shiver in the icy blast of the cold snap and to hear Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

And as far as the program went, the missing 3,000 didn't miss much, for, with the possible exception of one, possibly two, pieces, the evening's fare ran to the flashily brilliant rather than the profound and moving.

Which doesn't mean that all the tonal sheen and vibrant drive that Dr. Munch gives the Boston wasn't there in full measure.

FAR FROM IT, for, as always, every tiny note was polished brightly. Every phrase was elegantly set in its proper place. And Dr. Munch conducted every piece as if he were in sole charge of the Heavenly Choir on Judgment Day.

But the music simply could not be considered quite that celestial. The evening began with Schumann's brash, occasionally rousing Overture to "Genoveva," certainly a virtuoso piece for it afforded Richard Burgin's superb violin section a chance to function as a single, glittering instrument unhampered by the need to project any great amount of feeling.

This salty appetizer was succeeded by the one fine piece of the evening, the Sixth Symphony of Beethoven who, resting after the titanic effort of the Fifth, aptly titled it "Pastoral" and even supplied a little story about shepherds caught in a storm and such to go along with it.

Take it as shepherd lore if you wish, it is still sweet music, prettily put together and altogether enchanting.

It also provided Flautist Georges Laurent and Oboist Ralph Gomberg with exquisite solo passages which they used to exquisite advantage.

AND IT WAS HERE that the orchestra became, like the baton in Dr. Munch's hand, simply a servant of his slightest whim, seeming at every moment to know exactly what was required, exactly what was wanted. A slight crescendo? There it is. A little more pianissimo, please. Ah, that's perfect.

Then—and it causes pain to write this—came Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole." It is an ill wind that blows no good, but the wind and the noise of this piece beggar description. There will be a loud crash, a bang, the clacking of castinets, and then — languor. Contrast is fine, but it must have more point than merely to titillate. Even Charles Munch, lavishing the same care and attention to nuances and detail that was so evident in the Beethoven, could not make much music out of this.

And whereas it took the audience a full seven seconds to realize that the Beethoven was over, they were breaking into applause before the Ravel piece was finished. It was very cold last night, and perhaps that explains it.

THE EVENING WAS neatly rounded off by Roussel's Symphony No. 3 in G Minor, a piece that Dr. Munch and the orchestra performed at their Hartford concert last season. It is an explosive, melodic piece in a spicily modern vein, and it gains much on second hearing—which is always a sign that a work could easily stand another.

This work, too, was a complete technical delight, proving once more that the Boston Symphony, particularly with Dr. Munch at the helm, is a great and always exciting ensemble. It would be ever so much better, though, if they would keep their programs in the same class as their performances.—E. C.

Customers Right? 'Not Always'—Lenox

Lenox, Mass. — (AP) — From now on bare legs will not be permited at the summer concerts given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thomas B. Perry Jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, said last night ushers will hand out wraparound skirts to women who show up in shorts.

Tanglewood officials also said they would "prefer" that women not attend the concerts in slacks either.

Tanglewood Concert Aug. 10 to Be Benefit

On Friday evening, Aug. 10, Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eleazar de Carvalho, Leonard Bernstein and Richard Burgin, will conduct the Boston Symphony in a special concert for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass. This concert will be the feature of "Tanglewood on Parade" and the proceeds are ear-marked for the summer school for young musicians maintained at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts.

Mr. de Carvalho opens the concert with Berlioz's "Benevenuto Cellini," overture; Mr. Burgin will conduct Bloch's Nigun, for violin and orchestra, and Arbos' Tango Espagnol, with Ruth Posselt (Mrs. Burgin) as soloist in both pieces; Leonard Bernstein will play and conduct Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue; after which Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will give a brief address, and Mr. Munch will conduct Debussy's "La Mer" as the concluding number on the program.

Box seats are now available at the Berkshire Festival ticket office, Lenox, Mass., and cost $5; seats in the reserved section of the Shed are $4, and seats in the unreserved section, $2.50.

Russian Music At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., July 19—Attendance by members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center at student performances so far this season is expected to pass the 10,000 mark tomorrow night, when the student symphony orchestra performs a program of Russian music. Leonard Bernstein is to conduct the group in Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, and three other works will be led by student conductors.

The program will be the third in this year's series; last week Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra made his [illegible] student group, and the previous week, Richard Burgin, Boston Symphony concertmaster, conducted part of the program. This week, aside from Mr. Bernstein's 1951 Tanglewood debut as conductor, the program will include Moussorgsky's Prelude to Khovanstchina, Bernardo Federowski conducting; the first movement from Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto in D major, Anmin Steiner, soloist, and Robert Mandell, conductor; and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, Lorin Maazel conducting, and with a chorus prepared by Alfred Nash Patterson, of the Tanglewood choral faculty.

LAST WEEK OF MUSIC FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD

Shed Concerts Thursday, Saturday, Sunday; 'Parade' Friday

Tanglewood, Lenox, Aug. 5 — The final three concerts of the Shed series at Tanglewood will begin Thursday night, Aug. 9, with the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be led in this performance by Leonard Bernstein, and the concert will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky; it will be Mr. Bernstein's only appearance in a Berkshire Festival Concert this season. The soloists will be Adele Addison of Springfield, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. E. Power Biggs will be organist.

The last two regular Shed concerts of this Fourteenth Berkshire Festival will be devoted to playing of symphonies, Saturday night, Aug. 11, Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again conduct, in a program consisting of Beethoven's First Symphony, Honegger's Fifth Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's Pathetique (Sixth) Symphony. Sunday afternoon, Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra in an all-Brahms concert, including the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Second and Fourth Symphonies.

These three concerts will conclude the 1951 Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood. However on Friday night, Aug. 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a special concert as part of the annual program for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center, "Tanglewood on Parade". The Berkshire Music Center is the summer school for young musicians maintained at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in connection with its Berkshire Festival concerts, and those who purchase tickets to the concert on Friday will be invited to enjoy demonstrations of the work of advanced students from all its departments, starting at 6 p. m., before the Orchestra concert at 8:30, in the Shed. The conductors for this concert will be Mr. Munch, Mr. Bernstein as well as Eleazar de Carvalho and Richard Burgin (concertmaster of the Orchestra); Ruth Posselt will be violin soloist in the two works to be conducted by her husband, Mr. Burgin. The Program: Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, Carvalho conducting; Nigun, for Violin and Orchestra, by Bloch, and Tango Espagnol, by Arbos, Ruth Posselt, soloist and Burgin conducting; Rhapsody in Blue, by Gershwin, Leonard Bernstein playing and conducting; and Debussy's La Mer, Mr. Munch conducting. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak to the audience briefly during the program.

Tanglewood Lends Skirts to Skirtless

Music Festival Frowns on Shorts and Slacks

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 3 (AP).—Tanglewood officials "prefer" that ladies wear skirts when they visit the scene of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's famous summer concerts. But more and more of them have been showing up recently in shorts or slacks.

Today ushers offered informally-clad tourists wrap-around skirts for wear on the grounds.

Thomas B. Perry jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire Music Festival, said the wrap-arounds would "give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform—a skirt."

So far there are just eight wrap-arounds for visitors wearing shorts or slacks. They come in two sizes—large or medium.

Tschaikowsky's 'Queen of Spades' Made Charmingly Alive by Opera Department; Marvellous Performances in the Shed

By VICTOR PRAHL

In Tschaikowsky's, "The Queen of Spades," produced at Tanglewood on Monday and Tuesday nights by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center, Boris Goldovsky and his numerous associates scored another major success in their series of presentations. Some may consider the work dated but this period piece was brought to life with such charm, color, good taste, and altogether so convincingly, that one wondered why we have to listen to the same operas over and over again while a work of this kind remains neglected.

Built on a tale by Pushkin, the libretto by Modeste Tschaikowsky, the composer's brother, tells of the love of Hermann, a young officer, for Lisa. Hermann's other love is gambling, and from Lisa's grandmother, the countess, known as the Queen of Spades, he hopes to get the secret which will win him a fortune, so he can marry Lisa. When he demands the secret with pistol in hand, the countess dies of fright, but later her ghost haunts the tormented half-crazed Hermann, and finally tells him of the three lucky cards which will always win. The secret works the first two times but when he stakes all on the third card, it misses, and instead he turns up the queen of spades at which the ghost of countess bestows upon him a derisive smile. In despair he kills himself.

Good Entertainment

A gloomy Russian tale, to be sure, but it was not without humor in this performance and with its bright, fresh costumes and decor of the [illegible] period, it was like seeing [illegible] series of colorful prints of the [illegible]poch becoming animated, constituting first rate entertainment. The [illegible]ildren playing in the park when [illegible]e curtain went up, the singing of [illegible] duet and the solo, by the girls in [illegible]a's boudoir, and the pageant, "The [illegible]hful Shepherd," at the masked [illegible] were precious moments pictorially [illegible]s well as musically.

[illegible]e singers were all well prepared [illegible] seemed at home on their parts. [illegible] Lloyd as Herman sustained the [illegible] of the morose young officer convincingly and projected his arias with a sincere emotion and dramatic fervor. Phyllis Curtain was a beautiful Lisa, acting with charm and restraint, and did some excellent singing. Her full, rich high tones were especially beautiful. Eunice Alberts did another excellent piece of acting as the countess, but we rather questioned the taste of her staying in character when she took her bows. We knew who she was all the time. James Pease, handsomer than ever and in excellent voice, made a highlight of his finely delivered aria in the first act and Mac Morgan was a warm-voiced Prince Yetletsky. All of the smaller roles were in capable hands.

Pure Tschaikowsky

The score abounds in luscious, soaring melodies, expressive, dramatic, and many of them orchestrated in the best Tschaikowsky manner. Before the opera Boris Goldovsky spoke of his numerous conferences with Dr. Koussevitzky about its preparation and how the great conductor had looked forward to conducting these performances. He added that the performances might fall short of Dr. Koussevitzky's high standard but that they would do their best and were dedicating their efforts to the beloved maestro. Had he been present the main difference would probably have been in the orchestra; the playing of which would probably have been more refined and delicately nuanced. From where we sat in the sixth row it often over-powered the singers and the tone was not always homogeneous. On the other hand we are well aware that an orchestra hidden under a stage must be heard by the singers on the stage, and we were told by several who sat farther back that the balance sounded all right. In any case we are grateful to Mr. Goldovsky and his hard-working associates for the splendid revival of this seldom heard opera and we must congratulate him further on his fine translation of the work. In spite of the opera's other virtues, without this well-enunciated English text, the work would have lost in popular appeal.

Symphony Concerts

During the week there have been some marvelous performances by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch. Claudio Arrau's playing of Brahm's Second Piano Concerto was one of the finest within memory. Both he and Mr. Munch seemed to be set on bringing out the essential musical beauty of this great symphonic work and even those parts which usually stand out as moments of virtuosity for the soloist were merged as an expressive part of the whole. Mr. Arrau reaped a major triumph with the discriminating audience.

Mr. Munch conducted Sunday's program entirely from memory, including Samuel Barber's lively, well-made overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Copland's dreamy, nostalgic, "Quiet City." The audience enjoyed both and the two composers who were present must have been pleased with Mr. Munch's conception of their pieces. Mr. Copland showed his appreciation by rushing down the aisle and shaking hands with the conductor.

The prize piece of the concert however was Franz Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C minor. How delightful to hear such a work which is unfamiliar. After having had a similar experience in the last few weeks with another of his symphonies, one can only conclude that Schubert reached his greatest, fullest, and most moving expression in writing for the orchestra. The simplicity, understanding and warmth which Mr. Munch and the orchestra gave this music were equally responsible for its directness of appeal.

We had looked forward to the performance of the Franck Symphony and while we followed Mr. Munch's direction of it with interest and admiration, for some strange reason we were untouched emotionally at any time. The tempi were brisker here and there and some of the climaxes seemed exaggerated but such liberties are the right of a conductor. If the approach seemed too external, it was probably merely the reaction of a lone listener. The audience loved it.

Programs Stated For Tanglewood This Week End

The second series of concerts in the Shed at Tanglewood opened last night when Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted a program of four symphonic works. Among them was Beethoven's "Pastorale" Symphony, performed at the first Tanglewood concert in 1937 under Serge Koussevitzky. The remainder of the program included Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva," Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, and Roussel's Third Symphony.

Saturday evening Mr. Munch will conduct a concert beginning with Handel's "Water Music" Suite, and continuing with Béla Bartók's Music for Strings and Percussion, Ravel's Second "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite, this time with the rarely used choral parts, and concluding with Saint-Saëns' Symphony No. 3 with E. Power Biggs at the organ.

On Sunday afternoon, Eleazar de Carvalho will be the guest conductor for his annual appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood. Featured on his program will be Prokofiev's Second Piano Concerto with the Cuban pianist, Jorge Bolet, as soloist. Other works on Mr. de Carvalho's revised program will be Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition" as orchestrated by Ravel.

As usual during the Berkshire Festival season, there will be a public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday morning. Admission to this rehearsal, which begins at 10 and continues for more than two hours, is sold at the Tanglewood entrances, and is for the benefit of the Orchestra's Pension Fund.

Week-End Soloists at Festival Score Hit With Large Audience

Piatigorsky's 'Thrilling' Performance Highlights Series—Crowd of 7600 Turns Out for Haydn Program at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—Ideal weather favored the two programs devoted to the works of Joseph Haydn played yesterday afternoon and Saturday night in the Theatre-Concert Hall at Tanglewood. More than 3800 people attended each of the second brace of the season's concerts. Charles Munch played a symphony at the beginning and end of each program and for filling offered the cello concerto with Gregor Piatigorsky in a consummate performence yesterday afternoon and Seymour Lipkin in the D major piano concerto Saturday evening followed by the Sinfonia Concertante in which Richard Burgin was violin soloist, Samuel Mayes, cellist, Ralph Gomberg, oboe, and Raymond Allard, bassoon.

The Piatigorsky performance was the most thrilling event in the entire series to date. It was playing in the grand manner, broad and spacious, technically startling, tonally rich and with an over-all comprehension most sympathetically abetted by Munch's accompaniment. The ovation was released with instant spontaneity and he was recalled many times.

Young Lipkin's concerto Saturday evening was technically impeccable. He displayed a limpid and sensitive tone and complete grasp of the style. It was especially gratifying to those who could recall his first appearance at the Berkshire Music Center as a student and the subsequent progress through the various steps of a young artist's career which presently includes his membership on the Center's faculty. The first movement of the concerto, after he found a suitable tempo, was brilliant and the poetry of the slow movement matched it in degree.

Concertmaster Burgin was conspicuously happy in the violin solo variation of the slow movement of the "Drum Roll" symphony yesterday afternoon, as he also had been in the opportunities afforded the violin in the "Concertante" the evening before. There Munch for the orchestra held a little discourse with the solo violin which was charming in its phrasing and inflections. Cellist Mayes made his solos vital, Gomberg's oboe was gracefully suave and Allard's bassoon amazing in its encompassing of his difficult tasks.

Munch chose the G major symphony, No. 88 to open and the D major, No. 104, the "London" to close Saturday night's program. Yesterday afternoon he played the "Drum Roll" and the "Clock," Numbers 103, in E flat major and 101, in D major, respectively, to begin and end that program. The Haydn symphonies are not as fecund for such concentration as they might be and therefore there was not the refreshment that variety can supply in the sequence of numbers. Yet Munch seemed to be more at home, to find more meaty morsels in these pages than had been available to him in the choices of the previous week end.

The orchestra of Haydn's day was a small one and the use of a reduced personnel in this case was not only appropriate but effective. Some details were achieved with skill and delicacy; others were given cursory readings. The overall effect was of genuine and honest artistry. The ensemble played with warm and alert responsiveness and seemed ready and eager to give all that might be required of them.

Students To Present 'Ariadne'

Second Full Opera At Tanglewood Opens Tonight

"Ariadne auf Naxos," the second full opera to be produced this season by the Berkshire Music Center, will be performed tonight and tomorrow night in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood. Composed by Richard Strauss, it was first performed in Stuttgart, Germany, in 1912.

The story is that of a wealthy music patron of the 18th century who discovers after a dinner that an opera company with a serious production and a comedy troupe are on hand to perform for his guests. The two are performed simultaneously, and to the satisfaction of all.

The cast includes: Major-domo James Pease; music master, Mac Morgan; composer, Georgianna Bannister and Margot Willauer Stagliano; tenor, Robert Price and Raymond Smolover; officer, Ree Shelton; dancing master, Gen Cox and William Walker; wig maker, Robert Minser; lackey Peter Trump; Zerbinetta, Jac queline Bazinet and Eloise Stough ton; prima donna (Ariadne), Glady Spector; Harlequin, MacMorgan Scaramuccio, William Walker Truffaldino, Robert Mesrobian Brighella, Lawrence Avery. In the case of some of the roles, there will be alternates for each performance.

The libretto was written by Hugo vonHoffmannsthal, with an additional spoken interlude between the prologue and the opera by Eugene Haun. The entire performance is in English. Miss Sarah Caldwell will conduct the opera, which she staged with the opera department director, Boris Goldovsky. Sets are by G. Philippe de Rosier; technical directing by Robert Collington Ackart, and lighting by Nathaniel C. Merrill.

The performance is open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center whose contributions to help support the school were received early.

At the Post

By Grace Lewis

Tanglewood, summer home of phony Orchestra, in the Berkshire Mountains, leaves no doubt as to the vigor of music in America, vigor in execution, creation and appreciation. On the spacious grounds, open for wandering thru acres of tall pines and formal hedges, the visitor cannot help but be aware of a growing, dynamic musical force.

Grace Lewis

Quality of the music may be assumed. The Boston Symphony holds the world's top [illegible] soloists, teachers at Tanglewood to none. What welds the Tanglewood to the truly American spirit is the setting itself and its visitors.

The grounds are open on a general admission charge to thousands. Many ticket-buyers may claim seats in the open concert hall, but thousands lounge on the grass outside on blankets or in folding camp chairs, propped against trees, sheltered by the hedges or unabashedly taking [illegible] both.

During the concert—on the grounds or in the concert hall—there is absolute silence. Echoes from the strings of great artists, such as Cellist Gregor Piatigorsky are joined by the almost continual Berkshire breezes, to spread from hedge to hedge, lawn to lawn. There's little crowding at Tanglewood.

And of the paradoxes that are American—to Tanglewood come students hitchhiking, and the wealthy in limousines . . . The blue jeans, shorts and halters pass thru the gates, along with the latest fashions . . . The outdoor cafeteria offers baked beans and fruit punch . . . In the crowd, both inside the concert shed and on the grounds, are rapt listeners, ranging in appearance from Tootsie Rocket, in the Winnie Winkle comics, to dignified dowagers with culture reflecting from every blue-gray hair . . . Languages are many . . . License plates leave no state in America or province in Canada unrepresented.

Perhaps a sketch of an occurence at Tanglewood, Sunday, will illustrate.

An elderly lady, beautifully dressed and groomed, arrived shortly before the 3 p. m. concert. Tickets for the concert hall were sold out, so she bought general admission at the gate and went to the hall.

There, she approached a young student usher and inquired if any seats were available. Immediately helpful and respectful, the youth assured her there were no seats, but added: "It's nice and cool in the bushes, if you have a blanket."

The elderly woman shook her head, then brightened to ask: "Do you know where I could find a blanket?"

Music and Musicians

The Future of Tanglewood

By VIRGIL THOMSON

WHEN Serge Koussevitzky died on June 5 of this year he was no longer, as he had been during his tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the musical director of the Berkshire Music Center or of its Festival Concerts. That privilege belonged to Charles Munch. However, he had continued, at Mr. Munch's invitation, to direct the school and to teach there; and he had accepted to conduct this year certain of the concerts and one production of opera.

At that late date, little revision of plans was required beyond a substitution for Mr. Koussevitzky himself of persons already attached to the project. His conducting dates were assumed by Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Caryalho and Boris Goldovsky. His conducting class was taken over by Mr. Bernstein. His general direction of the school has been carried on by the heads of the five departments—Aaron Copland for composition, Mr. Bernstein for conducting, Mr. Goldovsky for opera, Hugh Ross for choral conducting, William Kroll for chamber music. So smoothly does the whole thing run that a visitor to Tanglewood nowadays would scarcely be aware, save for the lack of his physical presense, that the founder and animator of the project is no longer there to guide it.

Nevertheless, the future of the Center is a matter of concern to all. The school will have to have a director; plans for continued operation will need to be established; Koussevitzky's wishes remain a sacred charge to his widow and to his closer associates. And although these wishes seem not to have included many specific thoughts about organization and personnel, they certainly impose upon his spiritual heirs an effort to insure the survival of the music classes that makes of the Center a pedagogical influence as well as a mere concert-giving institution.

The Concerts and the School

TECHNICALLY and legally, if I mistake not, the whole project, including the school, belongs, at least as a musical operation, to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its musical direction, therefore, is ever the privilege of that society's musical director, at present Charles Munch. The Festival Concerts, their conductors and programs are naturally his chief concern, since they are the chief public presentations at the Center. Any relaxing of his control over these would no doubt cause their planning to be taken over by the orchestra manager. Since such a transfer of authority rarely works to the best musical advantage, it seems probable that Mr. Munch will go on, as he has done this year and last, supervising the concerts, even though some delegation of his powers might occur if he did not choose always to spend his summers in America. We do not need to worry, I think, about the public concerts.

The school, however, is not, as is well known, nearly so close to his heart as are the concerts. The direction of the school he will almost certainly delegate. And delegation to one of those close to Koussevitzky seems likely for two reasons. First, no change in the Division of the Library of Congress. The income of this is not available for any other purpose. school's high standard is desired or desirable. Second, money for its operation is more likely to be found by continuing along the present line than by changing to another. This does not mean that the school is congealed in its present methods, but merely that its life and traditions would most likely be best preserved by some one respectful of Koussevitzky's essential aims. Anything else would be another school, not this one.

Finances

NOW the Festival Concerts at Tanglewood make money. The school, with nearly half the students paying no tuition, costs money. The money made by the concerts goes into the Boston Symphony's general budget (this was long a source of contention with the early local organizers of the Center). The deficit of the school has always been met by the same source, except in the summer of 1942, when the Koussevitzky Foundation contributed $10,000. The Boston Symphony, with only $400,000 of endowment and with its emergency fund now exhausted, is in no position to continue supporting the school as this is at present operated (half the students are on scholarship), though a self-supporting school could, of course, continue to bring prestige to the institution.

Neither is the Koussevitzky Foundation able now to assume the obligation. Actually there are two Koussevitzky foundations. The one that commissions works from composers, with a capital of $100,000, is administered by the Music The other foundation, seated in Lenox, has at present neither capital nor income. Rumor lends it certain legacies about to be received and the residual estate of the late Serge Koussevitzky on the decease of his widow. It is certain, moreover, that a public drive for funds to continue one of the good Doctor's musical benefactions as a memorial to him would bring gifts from sources not yet tapped. Consequently, it is possible to envisage Foundation No. 2 as within a few years (and without anticipating Mrs. Koussevitzky's death) able to be of use to the school.

The Hour of Decision

THE next few months will, no doubt, determine whether the school's future will be handled entirely by the trustees and musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or whether Serge Koussevitzky's widow and close musical associates will be empowered by the orchestra's trustees to continue the school in some way of their choosing. Those close associates are chiefly two, Aaron Copland and Leonard Bernstein. This writer makes no prediction as to who will direct the school next year, whether there will be a school at all, or what changes of policy may be adopted regarding it. He merely observes that its present calm season will expire in one week.

After that, the trustees of the orchestra and the spiritual family of Serge Koussevitzky will have to make a decision. It seems clear to this observer that the interests of all concerned, as well as those of America's future musicians, urge the continuation of this unique school (with a major symphony orchestra for its faculty!) and urge its continuation in the spirit (though by no means necessarily the letter of organization) in which Serge Koussevitzky founded and for more than a decade directed it. So authentic a contribution to our musical life cannot be abandoned.

Informality Reigns at Berkshire Festival

Written for The Christian Science Monitor

A music critic on duty at the Berkshire Music Festival finished his picnic lunch with friends on the lawn of Tanglewood House, Lenox, Mass., and silently gazed about him. His eyes turned to the colonnade of the towering Hawthorne Pines, to the distant ancient oak near the Music Shed, to the graceful elms at the side of the old house, and the far-off hills forming the rim of the Stockbridge Bowl, with a flotilla of sun-drenched clouds sailing over.

"I just can't seem to tear myself away," the critic sighed, "and I should have started back to the city an hour ago."

That is typical of the spell of the Berkshire Festival. There is so much more to it than a series of summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Hobbies and Specialties

For example, as you explore Tanglewood before and between concerts, you see and overhear the symphony musicians and the eager students of intensive summer courses of the Berkshire Music Center (with headquarters in Tanglewood House). Musicians who, on stage and in concert attire, appear to be in a world apart, seem much closer when seen in jaunty summer sportswear.

Here is an excited discussion. You find that James Stagliano, the orchestra's first horn, while golfing at the nearby Stockbridge Country Club with bassoonist Theodore Brewster, has scored a rare achievement. At the 14th hole, at a distance of 180 yards, he has made a "hole in one."

Another instrumentalist has built his own sailboat. Bird lore is the specialty of another. And the detailed and practical knowledge of cameras and lenses possessed by a number of players would surprise a professional photographer. Here again is a musician enthusiastically anticipating a church supper open to the public in nearby Lenox.

'Goldfish Bowl'

Someone is hanging up a fine-looking set of watercolors on a wall of the glass-sided exhibition room, dubbed the "goldfish bowl," which stands beside the main gate to Tanglewood. A group of Boston Symphony musicians, on a stroll between stints of rehearsing, playing, and teaching, peer through a glass wall and enter the room for a better look at the views of countryside and rocky seashore. Quite a number of the musicians keenly enjoy exhibits of painting.

The man lifting a watercolor into place looks around—and everyone says, "Hello." He is Karl Zeise of the cello section.

"Tell us about this new job," one of the visitors says. "How much is the artist paying you?"

"Special rate, because the artist is an old friend."

"Who is he?"

"Karl Zeise."

They thought he was joking, but his signature was found on every watercolor. Many a musician in the orchestra has talents and interests not only unknown to the public, but even to most of his colleagues.

Spent Time in Maine

Mr. Zeise became interested in the cello and the pictorial art at about the same time—around his eighth year. His uncle, a professional musician, would leave his cello in a corner where it engaged the boy's attention until he felt that he just must learn to play it.

Also, he was always making pencil sketches of familiar scenes around his home in Needham, Mass., and the family's summer cottage on the Kennebec River, near Damariscotta, Maine. Eventually he was playing cello with the Philadelphia Orchestra. At the same time he worked at oil painting at the Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts. Joining the Boston Symphony, he also became a pupil of the water colorist, Elliot O'Hara, studying with him over a period of 10 years at his Goose Rocks Beach studio at Kennebunkport, Maine. Naturally, there are sea coast scenes in the Tanglewood exhibit.

'Unidentified Trio'

Laughter ripples across Tanglewood lawn. Two girl students are playing double-basses ("bull fiddles"), which tower above them, and a third is playing a huge brass instrument—a bass tuba.

"What are you playing?" someone shouts.

"An unidentified trio," is the gay answer.

In front of Tanglewood porch, a tall, pleasant man is chatting with three visitors. He turns out to be the composer and Music Center faculty member, Aaron Copland. Later two young men enter the house whom you have seen chatting in front of the handsome old Lenox Public Library. You learn that one of the composer-con-

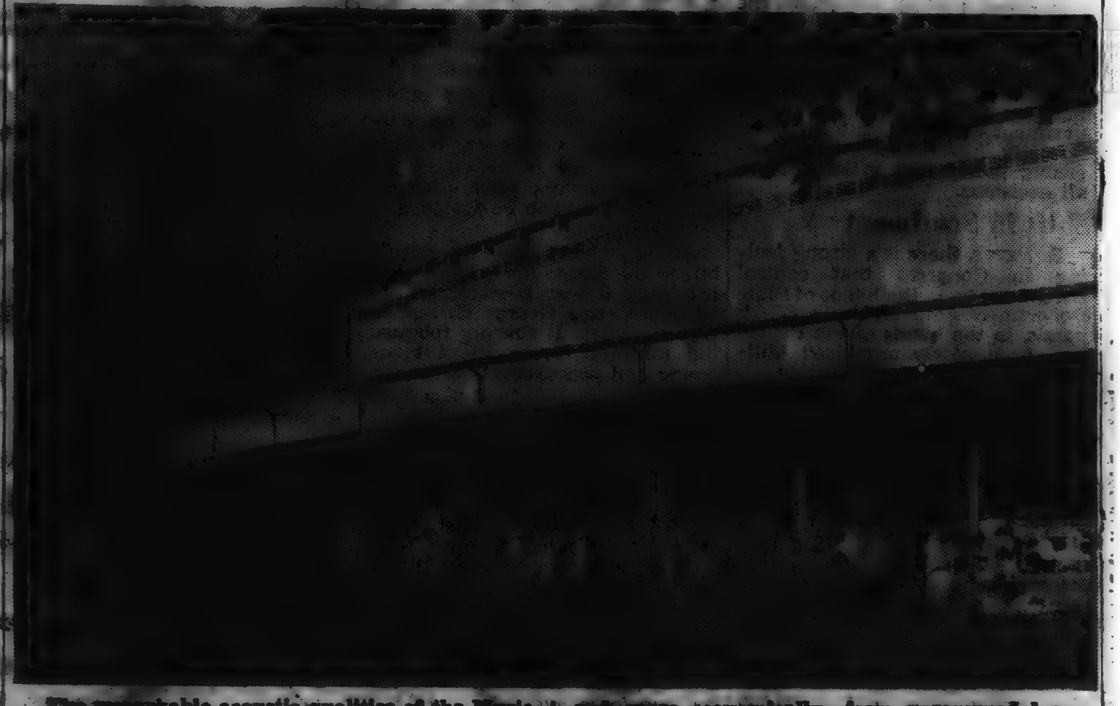
There's much more to Tanglewood than a series of summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Musical Festival. There's study, rehearsals, and the opportunity to explore the beauties of the countryside. Here, a group of children from Camp Owaissa, at nearby Monterey, arrives by bus to attend a public rehearsal.



The remarkable acoustic qualities of the Music Shed enable several thousand to hear the music clearly under the leadership of Charles Munch—and, more economically—from unreserved locations on the lawn outside. The shed itself has a seating capacity of about 6,000.

ductor, and pianist, Leonard Bernstein. The other is Irving Fine, composer and pianist. Both have been students at the center, have gone forth and gained fame, and returned to teach.—L. H.

Weather report. One semi-frigid morning last week when Director Charles Munch strode into the Shed at Tanglewood for rehearsal, the orchestra struck up "Jingle Bells." Munch appeared confused. "Jingle Bells" is seldom played by a symphony, and he was not familiar with it.

STRAUSS OPERA WELL RECEIVED AT TANGLEWOOD

'Ariadne On Naxos' Staged And Directed With Great Skill

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, Aug. 6—There were cheers and bravos mingled with the lengthy applause at the conclusion of the performance of Strauss' "Ariadne on Naxos" given tonight by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center here at Tanglewood. Under the direction of Sarah Caldwell, the performance went at a brisk pace and, as usual, the performance was staged and directed with great skill. The youthful singers gave of their best, which, in many cases, was of superior quality.

Play Within Play

"Ariadne on Naxos" is a play within a play, serious and gay. The libretto was written by Hugo Hoffmannsthal. Between the usual prolog and the opera itself there was interpolated a spoken interlude based on Moliere's "Bourgeois Gentlhomme."

The music of Strauss, and particularly the complex nature of the score of this opera is not the best medium for young voices or a student orchestra and it is to the credit of all participants that, musically, things went as well as they did. The vocal demands are as taxing as any score by Wagner. Indeed, there is a constant recurrence of the Wagner idiom throughout the opera.

Gladys Spector as Ariadne has a real Wagnerian voice and she strode about the rocks of her cave on the island of Naxos like an outraged Brunnhilde. Raymond Smolover revealed a voice of excellent quality and a dignity of carriage which fitted him well in the role of Bacchus. The singing of the three ladies, not unlike the "die Walkure" Valkyrie, was tentative, but they looked pretty.

Georgiana Bannister was easily the most creditable member of the cast. She provided a well conceived portrayal of the composer and revealed an opulent voice when the music did not lie to high. Another fine characterization, coupled with some excellent vocalism, was provided by Jacqueline Bazinet in her demanding role of Zerbinetta. This young woman has considerable histrionic ability and she is pleasant to look at.

Effective Staging

Mac Morgan revealed his versatility again as the music master and Gene Cox played the role of the dancing master to the hilt. The costumes were handsome and the staging simple and effective. Those taking part in the spoken interlude were excellent. The work was sung in English and, when the music permitted, the voices to be heard were generally understandable.

It cannot be said that this performance approached Strauss or was of professional character. This was the result of an opera workshop and that fact must not be forgotten in any appraisal of the performance. With the resources available, this was a valiant attempt to produce one of the most difficult works in the repertory. As such it was a real achievement. Whether or not it is wise to subject students to such an ordeal is a question, but it is safe to believe that the participants tonight will never forget this experience.

BIG ATTENDANCE MARKS WEEK AT TANGLEWOOD

Attendance by members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center at student performances so far this season is expected to pass the 10,000 mark this evening, when the student symphony orchestra performs a program of Russian music, it was announced yesterday. Leonard Bernstein is to conduct the group in Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, and three other works will be led by student conductors.

Many musical events are open to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center. The voluntary contributions to the Friends which constitute membership and entitle members to attend student concerts, go to help support the work of the school.

Saturday evening at 8:15 and Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock marks the end of the Bach, Mozart, Haydn series which are played in the theatre.

Mozart's music will be played at both these concerts.

The first of the concerts for this year will be played in the shed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra starting Thursday evening, July 26, at 8:15.

Carvalho Acclaimed, Shows 'Remarkable Development'

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The next to the last week end of concerts of the 14th Berkshire Festival was completed yesterday afternoon when Eleazar deCarvalho, making his sole appearance of the year at Tanglewood, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an exciting performance of the Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition." The timbre of the enthusiasm for his recalls mounted each time until he was finally "bravoed" with loud and lusty shouts. Mr. deCarvalho has indeed made remarkable development since his last appearance here. His "Euryanthe" overture of Weber showed that he has grown to favor a very much more intelligible conductorial manner, or rather, since he uses no stick, a brachial style, which he uses economically and with due deference to the abilities of the men of the orchestra.

DeCarvalho's "Death and Transfiguration" of Richard Strauss was an eloquent and dramatically conceived performance and he used the same sense of rather forceful contrasts for the "Pictures." He made it easy for us to visualize the various canvases Moussorgsky took as inspiration for his portraits. We might only quibble with certain ones: deCarvalho's "Goldenburg" was more stentorian than laconic, but that is truly searching for an argument, as it would be to recall the perilous steps leading up to the carousel in the Limoges marketplace and to wonder how one could be so agile in so hazardous a situation.

The soloist of the afternoon was Jorge Bolet in the Prokofeiff second piano concerto. He gave a virtuoso performance of what seemed to us to be a tremendously ungrateful composition. The relentless cascade of notes which becomes more an avalanche in the perpetual motion of the second movement made great demands on the soloist which he met heroically but we found little artistic satisfaction in the music.

Saturday Night Concert

On the previous evening Charles Munch chose a well-balanced program of Handel's suite arranged by Hamilton Harty from "The Water Music," Bartok's music for strings, percussion and celesta, the Ravel second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Saint-Saens third symphony.

The "Daphnis" suite was a moving performance. Munch gave it grandeur and a broad sweep. He also included the vocal choir which in other performances in this auditorium has been omitted. The voices, trained by Hugh Ross of the Berkshire Music Center faculty, are used as an instrument, and do not sing words. They add effectiveness to the music and contributed to a stirring performance.

In the Saint-Saens symphony the organ, played by E. Power Biggs, added a majestic sonority to the strings. Saint-Saens can hardly be called a master of invention but a master of sound he surely was. The easy flow of his music, its resonance in the registers he chooses, and other attributes warrant its presentation at less lengthy intervals. Munch gave it a spirited reading, never, where there was a choice, neglecting to step up the tempo. The orchestra gave him excellent responsiveness, releasing their full power when called upon or subduing it when hissed into a more quiet mood.

Because of the happily long lifespans allotted to both, Saint-Saens and Strauss, it is sometimes difficult to place them in their proper relative niches. As a matter of fact, of course, the Saint-Saens symphony which Munch led and the Strauss tone-poem which was on de Carvalho's list, are both compositions actually of Brahms's day, even not too far ahead time-wise of the Moussorgsky "Pictures" for piano before Ravel took a hand at their orchestration. This would go far to explain to anyone interested the state of musical progress at the time of the composition of these various works. There are reliable first-hand reports of the patriarchal Saint-Saens' reaction to the first performance of the Stravinsky "Rites." What he would have thought of the Bartok composition which Munch played is not beyond conjecture. This was a study in orchestral technique. Bartok divides the strings sections into more than usual number of voices and proceeds to write in fugues and canonic style until the whole would have become terrifically involved in less capable hands than those of Munch or in less capable execution than that which the Boston orchestra can provide. The intricacy demands so much concentration that little else, if there, can be discerned.

Munch and Bostonians Perform at Tanglewood

By a Staff Correspondent

LENOX, Mass., July 26—The Berkshire festival entered its most intensive phase at Tanglewood tonight, when the complete Boston Symphony Orchestra under its regular conductor Charles Munch gave the first of its nine concerts in the vast Music Shed. This was Mr. Munch's first appearance with his full orcrestra at Tanglewood, although he has conducted a chamber orchestra of Boston symphony players in eighteenth century programs during the last three week ends.

He began the program with Mozart's funeral music K477 as a tribute to his predecessor the late Serge Koussevitzky who played such an important part in the development of the Berkshire Festival to its present high artistic status and founded the Berkshire Music Center eleven years ago.

After the performance of the Mozart funeral music, the audience, as requested by Mr. Munch and the orchestra, rose and stood in silence for a minute or more in tribute to Dr. Koussevitzky's memory.

Among the listeners in the boxes were French Ambassador Henri Bonnet and Mme. Bonnet, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and Mrs. Koussevitzky. During the intermission Mme. Bonnet received a large bouquet of American beauty roses from the French-American clubs of Pittsfield and North Adams representing 2,100 families of French descent in this region.

The attendance was estimated at more than 7,000, leaving few seats unoccupied in the shed, while a good-sized group heard the music from the lawn outside. Listening from the lawn has long been a Berkshire festival custom. The weather had been threatening earlier in the day, but the sky was virtually cloudless by concert time. The usual traffic jam and lines of slowly crawling cars which have often prefaced major Berkshire festival concerts in the past were practically absent before tonight's performance, thanks to a new road to Tanglewood which by-passes the village of Lenox.

Virgil Thomson's review of this concert will appear in Saturday's Herald Tribune.

To Begin Berkshire Festival Concert Series Tomorrow

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its Berkshire Festival concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., tomorrow night at 8:15. Charles Munch will conduct Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of Serge Koussevitzky; Schumann's fourth symphony and the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz. Mr. Munch will also conduct the second concert Saturday night, with pianist Claudio Arrau as soloist, and the third concert on Sunday afternoon.

The Berkshire Music Center's choruses will sing works by Gabrieli, Robert Starer, Bela Bartok and Bruckner and Spanish folk music at Tanglewood this afternoon, with Hugh Ross and Alfred Nash Patterson conducting. A Koussevitzky memorial program will be given on Friday night. The Boston Symphony will hold a public rehearsal Saturday morning, and E. Power Biggs will give an organ recital on Saturday afternoon. Works of Boccherini, Hindemith and Mozart will be played in Sunday morning's student chamber music concert.

MUSIC

Our Critic's Report for the Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Those who were bewailing the fact that the Boston Symphony's "Koussevitzky tone" had become but a memory had not reckoned with Tanglewood. If the opening concert of the current Berkshire Festival on July 27 could be taken as a criterion, the orchestra had again become its familiar self as regards both tonal qualities and style of performance. After all, these were the same men playing the same instruments, and all that was needed to effect the transformation were the expressed intentions of Koussevitzky plus his magnetic personality.

Several years ago Koussevitzky was guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic for two weeks and he succeeded in making that body of players sound amazingly like the Boston Symphony. So to make the Boston Symphony sound like its recent self was really no trick at all. The whole Munch-versus-Koussevitzky problem was brought to mind at Tanglewood, though there is no need of going into it again. Suffice it to say that as man and musician Koussevitzky is suave whereas his successor in Boston is forthright.

There may still be some skeptical individuals who believe that the influence of a conductor upon an experienced body of players has been exaggerated, in the effect to give these leaders a build-up as glamor boys. To be sure, in the not so distant past the chief functions of a conductor were those of setting the tempo and keeping the players together. In the late 17th century they beat time by pounding the floor with a stick, and in the early 19th a rolled-up sheet of music paper served as a baton. It's a far cry from these simple expedients to the conductor of today who plays on the orchestra as on a gigantic instrument, sensitive to his slightest wish. When Ernest Ansermet was here two seasons ago he said that conducting a great American orchestra, such as the Boston or the Philadelphia, like riding a race horse. Those who have never stood before such a body of players probably have no idea of their responsiveness and the consequent responsibility vested in the leader.

* * *

Much can be and generally is accomplished in rehearsal. Nevertheless, an altogether extraordinary "Tristan" that I heard in Munich, under Dr. Muck, was in the conductor's own phrase "improvised", and not long afterwards I heard Strauss, without rehearsal, lead orchestra and singers through the complexities of his own "Salome." The story goes that Sir Thomas Beecham once arrived at the theatre not knowing what opera he was to direct and then conducted it from memory.

* * *

It might be observed that a conductor's power to control an orchestra is not always in exact ratio to the amount of fuss that he makes doing it. The restrained platform manner of a Weingartner, a Muck or a Strauss might give the contemporary auditor the impression that he is not getting his money's worth. A good deal of what passes for conducting nowadays is a physical dramatization of the music for the benefit, not so much of the orchestra, as of the audience. What really matters, of course, is how the music sounds and not how the conductor looks. We have lately had impressive examples of the outwardly calm, inwardly intense type of leading, that some fancy more than acrobatics or esthetic dancing, in Fritz Reiner's conducting at the Opera House of Strauss' "Salome" and "Rosenkavalier."

* * *

The late Richard Strauss was both a great composer and a fine conductor. When Mr. Munch gave a memorial performance of his "Symphonia Domestica" last fall, the program book offered a collection of his wise sayings, as translated and quoted in the British magazine, "Tempo."

* * *

They deserve a wide circulation, especially among young conductors, for whom they were largely intended. Some of our elders could heed such injuctions as "Never look at the brass encouragingly, except with a quick glance for an important lead in. On the contrary, never let the horns and woodwinds out of your sight; if you hear them at all they are already too loud. If you think the brass is not strong enough, tone them down two points further." And again: "The left hand has nothing to do with conducting. The best place for it is the waistcoat pocket, except at the most to give an occasional hint to damp the tone down or some insignificant sign; but for this an inperceptible glance is really sufficient."

* * *

Though the book is really intended for the fledgling conductor, "The Grammar of Conducting," by the Metropolitan's Max Rudolf, with a foreword by George Szell (Schirmer), should interest any musician, and its 345 pages of diagrams, advice and musical examples give a convincing illustration of how complicated a matter the modern art of orchestral direction has become. Yet Strauss could dismiss the whole business thus: "Instead of the arm, one conducts best by the ear; the rest follows automatically."

TANGLEWOOD BEGINS CONCERTS THIS WEEK

LENOX, Mass. — The Berkshire festival in the music shed at Tanglewood is commencing this weekend with three of the nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Charles Munch, its music director.

Tomorrow evening Mr. Munch will conduct Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of his predecessor, the late Serge Koussevitzky.

Saturday evening Claudio Arrau will play the solo in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto. Sunday afternoon the orchestra will play Barber's Overture "The School for Scandal," Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Other programs will be held on Thursday, Aug. 2, and Saturday, Aug. 4.

The Berkshire Festival's 14th season opens Thursday in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director.

For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday at 8:15 p. m. and Sunday at 3:00 p. m. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5, and on Thursday, Aug. 9; Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first-rate musical center each summer.

Mr. Munch's program for this week is varied and includes works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert.

For this performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the orchestra will be using a set of bells especially cast for Mr. Munch in France; the score of the work calls for bells representing those of a church, but it is usually ordinary tubular chimes that are used instead of real bells.

Berkshire Groups Stage Koussevitzky Testimonial

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., July 28.—A testimonial to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky, by the various departments of the Berkshire Music Center, was given last night in the music shed at Tanglewood.

The Berkshire Music Center, as you will remember, was the late conductor's own pet project at these grounds where music is celebrated every summer. He had been instrumental not only in its founding, but also had devoted a great deal of his time to developing it, to make it a place for music to be studied, made and enjoyed by free young people in a free and encouraging atmosphere.

The gathering of 3500 consisted of friends of the Berkshire Music Center, their friends, in turn, and students and members of the faculty. And a most appreciative throng it was, attentive, interested and, at least to my mind, serious of mien and behavior.

Krueger Directs.

The program began with the performance of the Bach Cantata No. 118, "Oh Jesu Christ, Mein' Lebens Licht," performed by a chorus under the direction of John Krueger.

Next in order was the rendering of two movements from the Schubert "Trout" Quintet by members of the chamber music department —Jeanne Sandbank, violin; Anne Denton, viola; Moshe Amitay, cello; David Moore, bass, and Ravnan, piano.

Representing the class in composition, Raymond Wilding-White conducted his own setting of the "Psalm III," a motet for women's voices and trombones.

The opera department, of which Boris Goldovsky is the head, offered a scene from the third set of Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame," the opera nearing its production up here on Monday evening. The vocal soloists were Phyllis Curtin, as Lisa, and David Lloyd as Herrmann, while Mr. Goldovsky himself conducted.

Bernstein Leads.

These comprised the musical fare up to the intermission, and, though criticism is not especially called for, considering the memorial dedication of the evening, it might be said that Mr. Wilding-White and his motet and Mr. Goldovsky and his operatic were the chief sustenance.

Following the intermission, Leonard Bernstein, heading the class in conducting, led the student orchestra through a slow and gravely expressed account of the funeral march from the Beethoven "Eroica" Symphony. To close the proceedings Lorin Maazel, directed the chorus and orchestra through the Stravinsky "Symphony of Psalms."

Mr. Maazel, who is assistant conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony, has had quite some experience as a conductor, though he is now only 22 years old. He started as a boy prodigy of 7, you remember, and among his distinctions is conducting the NBC Symphony at one summer concert.

He seems to be a poised, knowledgeable young man. His beat is clear and steady. He seems to know how to get the effects he wants, which, last evening, were more or less a piece with authenticity.

The memorial concert was much applauded by the gathering, who were generous to all concerned.

Berkshire Festival Opens on Thursday

The 14th season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed opens this Thursday (July 26) with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday evening at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3:00 o'clock. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5.

Mr. Munch's program for this week includes works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; and Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert. Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to Oberon; continues with the first Tanglewod performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Sympony; and concludes with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto; the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, will be soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's Overture, The School for Scandal; Aaron Copland's The Quiet City; Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony; and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

In addition, Tanglewood is the campus of a unique school for young musicians, the Berkshire Music Center, which is in its ninth season this summer.

One of the highlights of the more than 30 musical events performed during the 1951 season will be this Friday's program (July 27), which will present the work of all departments of the Center in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118; a chamber music group performing Schubert's Trout Quintet; a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion; a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," which was to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's first venture into operatic conducting, in its performances here this summer; and performance of Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, a work especially beloved by Dr. Koussevitzky, and commissioned by the Orchestra originally for its 50th anniversay, in 1930.

Fall Showings Concluded With Trip to Tanglewood

This is the last in a series of articles on the New York Dress Institute press week for fashion editors from all parts of the U. S. by Miss Alice F. Keegan, women's editor of The Post-Standard, who has been in New York City attending the showings of couturier fashions.

"TRAIN for Tanglewood"—which took weary fashion writers from the hot sidewalks of New York to the cool, refreshing Berkshire hills—proved a thrilling conclusion to the New York Dress Institute's press week for 200 fashion writers.

Not only did it give us the quiet and relaxation that we sought in vain all week in teeming old New York, but also the chance to "let our hair down and get our swollen feet up," so to speak.

Jolly Time

The train ride from Grand Central to Lenox, Mass., proved to be a jolly four hours with fashion interspersed and even a salon set up on board where we could freshen up with cosmetics provided by one of the sponsors of the trip, Tussy Cosmetiques.

It was fun to see Ruth Ann Bolway, promotions director for Tussy, on the train. One of the most efficient gals I've met in this game, she also is utterly charming and took time out from her busy schedule to get me in a corner and ask about Syracuse. She has a "family" interest in Syracuse because her brother, Frank Bolway, married the former Alice Ayer, daughter of Dr. Wardner D. Ayer of Syracuse.

One of the cars was set up with displays of cosmetics, pictures of fashions, fabric samples and a fascinating step-by-step exhibit showing the stages thru which a felt hat passes before it ultimately reaches the feminine head. The hat exhibit was arranged by Merrimac Hat Corp. As many as 1,000 dozen hats are blocked and trimmed in one day thru the organization of Merrimac's modern production units, we learned!

SEVERAL "back to school" costumes by Nelly De Grab (who, incidentally, has turned out some very sharp-looking clothes) headed the train fashions accessorized by Marvella jewelry, Hanes hosiery (replacing the back seam with an arrow—pointing downward for a slenderizing effect), Aris gloves, and Tussy cosmetics.

Bellciano coats in stunning styles and luscious colors also had a place in the showing of clothes on the train, as well as the evening show at Eastover, a charming spot where we dined on the lawn and terrace and remained for a spotlight show on the lawn.

One of the most popular New York models, Dixie, added the right touch of glamor to Saturday night's show. She reminded me of Dorothy Evans, who does such a terrific job of modeling for The Addis Co. The picture she made in the last frock modeled Saturday at Eastover under the stars, a Cavalier red satin evening dress with bow decolletage by Varden Petites, will long be remembered by her audience, I'm sure.

"MISS CLAIROL" also made an appearance on the program, when her fading tint of several weeks was revived by an actual demonstration. In spite of the fact that a fuse blew out while the model was under the drier, she returned to the stage before the show concluded, with a new coif and color called "flame"—all possible within a 20-minute period, we were told, with a gentle reminder that none of us needs to be unhappy with our present hair color, to wit, dull grey.

It seemed good to see down-to-earth food like New England style baked beans in huge pots, corn chowder, lobster and other sea food, simply WONDERFUL New England pudding and blueberry pie, and all kinds of fresh fruit.

After looking at high fashion all week, Tanglewood had the effect of literally visiting another planet.

Failles and satins of the last several days gave way to cottons, dresses, shorts, pedal pushers, sun dresses,—the fashion fare for the thousands who converged at the Berkshire Music Festival center in the Berkshires for a heavenly weekend of symphonic music under the baton of the world-famed conductor, Dr. Charles Munch.

As we glanced around at the Tanglewood contingent in casual summer wear, we couldn't help but spot fashions we viewed at last January's showings . . . a Tina Lesser here, a Claire McCardell there.

"Train to Tanglewood" helped point up the old analogy between good music and good clothes. For have not the lovely lines and rich colors of, say a Hattie Carnegie gown, been compared to a beautiful symphony in lines and rhythm and tone?

ACRES OF MUSIC LOVERS: It's easy to see that most of the 9500 who were at Tanglewood yesterday afternoon for the finale of the second week of the three-week Berkshire Symphonic Festival were not in the great Shed. For the first time in many seasons, the number of empty places in the 6000-seat Shed was conspicuous. For Saturday night's concert, there were 10,800 patrons. Generally speaking, the attendance this year has held up pretty well, the management says, but tickets for seats in the Shed are much more readily obtainable than in previous seasons.

First Music Shed Concerts At Tanglewood This Week

Charles Munch to Conduct Opening Programs Thursday, Saturday and Next Sunday; Special Music Center Program Friday

Lenox, July 21—The 14th season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed will open Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3.

Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5, and on Thursday, Aug. 9; Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis," in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphon Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood the great musical center it is.

This Week's Programs

Mr. Munch's programs for this week are varied and include works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; and Schumann's fourth symphony and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony will complete the opening concert.

For this performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the orchestra will be using a set of bells specially cast for Mr. Munch in France; the score of the work calls for bells representing those of a church, but Mr. M. is usually ordinary tubular chimes that are used, instead of real bells.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's overture to "Oberon;" continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's sixth symphony, and concludes with Brahms' second piano concerto with the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, as soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal;" Aaron Copland's "The Quiet City; Franz Schubert's fourth symphony; and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Scene from Opera

One of the highlights of the more than 30 musical events performed during the 1951 season will be Friday's program, which will present the work of all departments of the Music Center in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118; a chamber music group performing Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, and a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion.

Also to be given are a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, "Pique Dame," which was to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's first venture into operatic conducting, and performances of Beethoven's Egmont" Overture and Stravinsky's "Symphon of Psalms," a work especially beloved by Dr. Koussevitzky, and commissioned by the orchestra originally for its 50th anniversary, in 1930.

The complete performances of "Pique Dame," by the Tanglewood opera department under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, will take place next week, July 30 and 31. The other opera production, aside from a program of three one-act operas staged this past week, will be Richard Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos," Aug. 6 and 7. Attendance at these productions is by invitation to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

THE MUSICAL DIGEST

By ROLAND GELATT

Munch Gives Series Bachian Eminence

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 10.—Gourmets may look to Strasbourg for creamy "foie gras"; music lovers are more likely to celebrate the Alsatian city for its persuasive interpreters of Bach. To the Strasbourg roll of honor add Charles Munch, for judging from the two all-Bach concerts that open this year's Berkshire Festival, the Bachian well-spring to equalling the stature of that other Alsatian native son, Albert Schweitzer. This was virile, absorbing, finely inflected playing, which maintained the Teutonic and Latin elements of Bach's music in splendid equipoise. Such a balance obviously appeals to musicians from Strasbourg, with its linguistic and cultural loyalties divided between Germany and France.

Conforming to what must be an innate duality, Munch imbued Bach with the racy zest and dancelike lilt befitting an admirer of Vivaldi and Couperin, as well as with the severe, pedantic beat of the sober cantor whose thoughts could easily trail off into sorrowful, mystic ramblings. Both characteristics are valid, as Bach was a man of strict northern stock and temperament who had been much influenced as a musician by southern charm and gayety. It is not often, however, that the two elements are argued as convincingly as they were by Munch and his Boston Symphony players on this occasion.

TURNING FROM the general to the particular, an enumeration of the week end's memorable achievements would include the Final Chorus from the "St. Matthew Passion" (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky), in which Munch managed the dynamic shifts very effectively; the Fourth "Brandenburg" Concerto, with adroit solo work by George Laurent, flute, and Richard Burgin, violin, complementing the conductor's well-chosen tempos; and the Concerto for Three Claviers (pianos in Tanglewood) in D minor, played by Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, and Ralph Berkowitz with a sense of ensemble rarely experienced in instrumental combinations of this kind. But it would in no wise do to depreciate the worth of the other "Brandenburgs" (Nos. 2, 3 and 6) or the other choral offerings ("Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus," a secular cantata, and the "Magnificat").

The cantata, for which Munch turned over his baton to Hugh Ross, was notable for James Pease's successful negotiation of a precariously difficult bass part.

FOR THE FIRST TIME since its inception the Berkshire Festival opened without the participation of its founder and guiding genius. Koussevitzky was present, however, in the memories of many, and the liberal attendance evidenced the strength of the foundation he built. Charles Munch, making his Tanglewood debut, faced the double hazard of stepping into a revered musician's shoes and conducting an extensive repertory on short notice. If the enthusiasm of the audience—recalling him a half dozen times after each work—is any indication, Munch in his first week end at Tanglewood more than made good.

TANGLEWOOD STUDENTS WILL OFFER MEMORIAL TO LATE KOUSSEVITZKY

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 26—Yesterday, Thursday, July 26, was the 77th anniversary of Serge Koussevitsky's birth, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its series of concerts at Tanglewood's Music Shed without him for the first time since Tanglewood became a center of music, thirteen summers ago. In honor of his memory, Charles Munch and the orchestra opened their program with the playing of the Funeral Music by Mozart, K. 477. The remainder of the Thursday evening concert consisted of Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony, which is acclaimed as one of Mr. Munch's most stirring performances, much as Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony was a forte of the late Dr. Koussevitsky.

This evening, again in honor of Dr. Koussevitsky, students from all departments at the Berkshire Music Center will participate in a memorial program, in place of the regular student symphony orchestra concert. In this program, the choral department under Hugh Ross will be represented by a performance of Bach Cantata 118, Klytsum Shapiro, of Israel, conducting. The chamber music department will then present the final two movements of Schubert's Trout Quintet, with Jeanne Sandler, Boston, violin; Anne Denton, Binghamton, N. Y., viola; Moshe Amitay, Israel, cello; David Moore, Gainesville, Ga.; and Audun Rayman, Gainesville, Ohio, piano. The department of composition will present a new work by Raymond Wilding-White, Boston, entitled "Psalm III, a Motet for Women's Chorus and Four Trombones. The opera department will perform in concert version, a scene from the third act of Tchaikovsky's Pique Dame, which will be performed fully next Monday and Tuesday, with Boris Goldovsky conducting. The orchestral department will perform Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, Lorin Maazel, [illegible] conducting, and with chorus prepared by Hugh Ross. And Leonard Bernstein will conduct the student orchestra in the funeral march from Beethoven's Eroica Symphony (No. 3). Admission to this program is open to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood Symphony Concerts Open This Week

The first of the nine Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in the 6,000-seat music shed at Tanglewood, Mass. will take place this Thursday evening at 8:15.

The concerts, which annually attract scores of music lovers from this area, will continue for the next three weeks, with concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15, and Sunday afternoons at 3.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony, will conduct seven of the nine concerts. Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct the one next Sunday afternoon. On Thursday, Aug. 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, the late conductor emeritus of the orchestra.

This Thursday's concert will open with Mozart's Funeral Music, K.477, played in memory of Mr. Koussevitzky. The program will include Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony.

The Saturday evening program will consist of Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Prokofieff's Symphony No. 6, and Brahm's Piano Concerto No. 2 with the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, as soloist.

The program next Sunday afternoon will include Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," Aaron Copland's The Quiet City, Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony, and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

This Friday evening, young musicians studying at the Berkshire Music Center will present the work of all departments in a special memorial to Doctor Koussevitzky.

Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118, a chamber music group playing Schubert's Trout Quintet, a concert version scene from Tchaikovsky's Opera, "Pique Dame," and performances of Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms.

Munch Leads Symphony At Tanglewood

Tribute Paid Memory Of Koussevitzky As Concert Series Opens

BY T. H. PARKER

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 26.—In the welcome cool of the evening after a sweltering hot day, the main concert series of the fourteenth Berkshire Musical Festival opened here tonight.

It would have been the seventy-seventh birthday of Serge Koussevitzky, but instead there was funeral music by Mozart, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the audience rising in silence at its conclusion as Charles Munch stood with his hands raised before his chest in a gesture curiously devout, and the sound of the woman next to this reviewer swallowing her tears.

Otherwise, the habits and customs of Tanglewood, the shrine and the cult, were the same today as in all their yesterdays. There were some 7000 persons attending less than capacity in the music shed, but with more than the usual population recumbent on the grassy lawns.

Same Background

The murmuring pines and hemlocks formed the same inky background to the scene, the same birds or their descendents took the same opportunities to sing their night songs under such Munchs baton.

The festival's aspect of plush, once so pronounced in what might be called the early, or Baker electric period of Tanglewood, continues to dim. The boxes now are the last frontier of what is euphoniously called "better dress." There are ever more sports clothes, slacks and bar backs, unjacketed men, ever more young people and finitely more children from nearby camps. Tanglewood becomes ever more enfamille.

Traditional Trend

Tonight's program continued the conservative trend traditional to Tanglewood music making. It including in addition to the memorial music by Mozart, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berloiz's Symphonie Fantaetique. Mr. Munch read them in a way that would have brought back Dr. Koussevitzky's benign glow. His orchestra sounds a little different from that of the good doctor, but his interpretations "look" and feel very much the same, when all is said and done.

Mr. Munch has refocused the orchestra, bringing it into a better balance, a greater transparency and resonance, and a sharper color than it has had in many years. It is a crisper instrument than when Dr. Koussevitsky played upon it. But in the bold energy, the far flung scope and dimension of the music made, and above all else in the showiness of the reading, Mr. Munch is continuing very much the temper and style of the Boston former head. Mr. Munch displays the music to its best advantage, almost as if he were personally modelling it for fashion points.

Handsomely Played

The opening Mozart, full of dark elegance, was handsomely played, heart stirring not only because of its dedication to Dr. Koussevitzky, but because so many times special-occasion music does not quite come off. For re-detailing, the Schumann might have have been put back in rehearsal, Mr. Munch's reading was somewhat slapdash, not making the most of the variety of the writing, slurring the nuances in the fine-spun passages of the second and third movement. As always, there were numerous passages where Mr. Munch's reading seemed idiocyncratic. Sometimes he seems impatient of detail, but in the rousing bravura sections, he electrifies.

The performance of the Symphonie Fatastique was the brilliantly bizarre drama that the conductor and audience made when they performed it in Bushnell Memorial last season. Few conductors get the daemonic poetry out of its sounds and sensations as Dr. Munch does, manage to exploit the sheer theater of the piece and still invest it with a sense of emotional dignity and musical important.

The orchestra played brilliantly in effect, but unprecisely here and there in matters of ensemble. Mr. Munch received the curtain calls, the bravo's that indicate the audience's complete acceptance of him as the great doctor's successor. The king is dead, long live the king!

CONCORDS AND DISCORDS

By FELIX DEYO

Koussevitzky—A Brief Retrospect

The millions of music appreciators who have been acquainted with the art of the late Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from 1924 to 1949, will lament his death. Your chronicler is one of these millions.

Although retired two seasons ago, because of advancing years and wavering health, Koussevitzky was personally active at the 1949 and 1950 summer concert series at Tanglewood (Massachusetts), and had planned to conduct some of the current concerts at this historical dreamspot, founded primarily through his efforts and now a permanent shrine to his memory. Then, too, we cite the fact that Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony may yet, indefinitely, be heard in a long list of orthophonic recordings, many of them available here in the circulating record department of Baldwin Public Library.

Throughout his quarter-century regime as conductor of the B.S.O., Koussevitzky developed and maintained in his players a very high plane of instrumental ensemble perfection. The decisiveness and clarity of the strings was a pleasure to hear, also the delicacy and tonal purity of the woodwind. The brass was brilliant without being blatant, the percussion plangent without losing refinement. The full orchestra blend was little short of splendrous.

In the matter of repertoire, the Russian conductor, whose continental fame spanned from Petrograd to Paris and London, professed nonpartiality for the schools; his catholicity embraced all with equal ardor, countries and periods irrespective. But he did champion the seven symphonies of Jan Sibelius, and nobly so, also many of the younger American composers.

There can be no doubt that Koussevitzky's conducting, at its best, cast a strong impression, nor gainsaid the superfineness of his work; plus something of 'originality' not previously encompassed in other conductor's philosophies and readings. Take, in instance, the original force brought to bear on Beethoven's fifth symphony, interpreted in the complete contour of perfect art form, without attempting to uncover startlingly new effects. And yet there were evidences, here and there, of Debussy-like ilk—a reversion to cloudy pianissimi, foreign soil, indeed, it might seem to some super-critics, for the sturdy German Beethoven, whose softest passages or sections were not meant for such smotherings. Withal, however, it was a beautifully proportioned interpretation of a myriad-minded symphony, expansive and eloquent, destined for many conceptions along the line in Time's corridor. In restrospect, such a version as Koussevitzky's stands out as cyclopean, revealing a massively unmatched Beethoven, towering grimly and terrifically beautiful.

Paradoxically, at frequent moments, the conducting of this Russian batonist was tainted with a trite perfunctoriness and lack of vital interest. Was this, perhaps, because of the fact that Koussevitzky did not have the backerup of a formal musical education? The various biographies of his career will shed further enlightenment on this matter for the curious seeker of peculiar peculiarities.

Serge Koussevitzky was, without doubt, the best appareled man in music. In the satorial elegancies of masculine garb, he rivalled New York City's now gone but yet remembered —James J. Walker. His (S.K.'s) back was grace personified, and the plastic sweep of his wrists a thing of intensive ecstasy.

MUNCH LAUNCHES TANGLEWOOD FETE

Conducts Opening Concert of Berkshire Music Festival—Koussevitzky Is Honored

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 26—As fate would have it, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at Tanglewood in the first of the symphonic concerts of the fourteenth Berkshire Music Festival, on the date that would have been the seventy-seventh birthday of the late Serge Koussevitzky, the musical founder of this famous festival. For twenty-five years, Mr. Koussevitzky held the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that height of technical and interpretative excellence which has given these festivals their international reputation.

The memory of Koussevitzky, who died on June 4, and his immeasurable services to the Boston Symphony and its public was observed by the performance of Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music at the beginning of the concert. Mr. Munch, in a few words from the stage, requested that the audience stand for a silent moment in homage to the departed. Thereafter he proceeded to the main works of his first festival appearance in the Music Shed with the Boston Symphony.

For this occasion he wisely chose two works for the interpretation of which he is justly celebrated. The first of these was Schumann's Fourth symphony. The second, which concluded the evening, was Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," a work in the interpretation of which Mr. Munch can have had but few rivals.

Strongly Contrasted Scores

Nor would it be easy to imagine two scores more strongly contrasted in spirit and matter than these—the poetry and introspection of Schumann, the blazing and impetuous tone drama of Berlioz. In each work Mr. Munch seemed especially at home, and especially communicative. His Schumann is rendered with understanding and sensitiveness which no amount of training or experience, by themselves, could have brought him. His Berlioz is even more to the manner born and inescapably effective.

By the side of the Schumann music, the "Symphonie Fantastique" was of the most striking color and impact. The two works set each other off in a singularly effective manner. There are those who find the Munch reading of the "Fantastique" overingenuous and so dramatic that our nerves have been drained of the power to respond to the music before it is over. For ourselves, this reading is as remarkable for its delicacy and suggestion in the passages of more subtle nature as it is for the dramatic fury of the "March to the Scaffold" movement and the finale.

Perhaps the first movement is the finest achievement of them all in its passion and poetic feeling. Every phase of its emotion, every fleeting impulse or mood is most flexibly and intuitively revealed. It is true that "The Scene in the Fields," never too easy to sustain in its appeal through the entire movement, can easily begin to drag or lose atmosphere in a big open-air auditorium; nor does it do any good to hurry its tempo a trifle to overcome this handicap. But the "March to the Scaffold" and the finale—"The Witches Sabbath"—are still of an evocative intensity and were projected with sweeping power and temperament.

At the end of the performance there was an ovation for Mr. Munch and his men from an audience of between 7,000 and 8,000.

Ambassador Henri Bonnet At Tanglewood Tomorrow

French Statesman and Wife Will Be Guests at Berkshire Music Festival as Major Shed Concerts by Boston Symphony Begin

Ambassador of France Henri Bonnet and Madame Bonnet will be guests at the opening of the Berkshire Festival in the music shed at Tanglewood tomorrow evening, when their countrymen, Charles Munch, will conduct the first of nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra. They will stop off on their way back to Washington from Detroit, where the ambassador will make three speeches at the 250th anniversary of the founding of the city by Cadillac.

Dedicating the opening number, Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, to the memory of the late Serge Koussevitsky, whose 77th birthday it will be, the orchestra will play Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz. The concert will be followed on Saturday night by Weber's Overture to "Oberon," the Prokofieff Sixth Symphony and the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms, with Claudio Arrau as soloist. The series will conclude Sunday afternoon with Barber's "School for Scandal," Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Students' Program

Also dedicated to Dr. Koussevitsky, until his death in June director and inspiration of the school, will be the students' program Friday night. It will open with the Bach cantata No. 118, conducted by Eli Shapira of Israel, followed by the last two movements of Schubert's Trout Quintet (Variations and Finale), an original composition, "Psalm 3, Motet for women's chorus and four trombones," dedicated by Raymond Wilding-White, student of the Italian composer, Luigi Dallapiccola, to Dr. Koussevitsky, conducted by the author or Hugh Ross; the sixth scene from "Pique Dame," (Tschaikovsky) in Act 3, directed by Boris Goldovsky, and concluding with the Funeral March from the second movement of Beethoven's Third ("Eroica") Symphony, probably conducted by Leonard Bernstein, and Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," Lorin Manzel conducting.

Following the public rehearsal of the Boston Orchestra Saturday morning at 10 for the benefit of its pension fund, E. Power Biggs, orchestra organist, will give at 3 a recital of Antonio Soler's "Concerto in G major," Cesar Franck's Prelude in B minor and Piece Heroique, and Julius Reubke's Sonata in C minor.

A revised program for the chamber music Sunday morning at 10 includes Mozart's Quintet for Wood-winds and Piano in E flat major, Hindemith's Quartet No. 3 and Faure's Quartet No. 1 in C minor for piano, violin, viola and cello.

Seats are obtainable at the box office for the Festival concerts, and when they are exhausted general admission will be sold for those who wish to listen from the lawn. All student events are open to friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

Tanglewood Music Near

The Berkshire Festival's 14th season opens Thursday in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director.

For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday at 8:15 p. m. and Sunday at 3:00 p. m. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5, and on Thursday, Aug. 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first-rate musical center each summer.

Mr. Munch's program for this week is varied and includes works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert.

For this performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the orchestra will be using a set of bells especially cast for Mr. Munch in France; the score of the work calls for bells representing those of a church, but it is usually ordinary tubular chimes that are used instead of real bells.

Famed Gibson Girls Feature Half-Dozen Museum Exhibits

The world-famous Gibson Girl in all stages of her development features the six exhibits the Berkshire Museum has prepared for its summer season. They will run through August.

More than 275 items by and about Charles Dana Gibson are arranged chronologically in the upper galleries, starting with the artist's first silhouette at the age of five to his last drawing. Mr. Gibson, who was born in Roxbury in 1867 and died in New York in 1944, was most famous for his Gibson Girl, the pin-up girl of the 1890s. The collection was assembled by the Museum of the City of New York with the assistance of Alfax Downey, Gibson's biographer, and all of the items were borrowed directly from the original owners and will be returned to them after this exhibition.

Many of the works are from the collection of Mrs. Gibson, but a set of 23 Royal Doulton plates with Gibson illustrations were loaned by Miss Gypsy Rose Lee, another famous illustrator.

English and French

Featured on the same floor with the Gibson exhibit are paintings by E. Barnard Lintott, late English painter, and William Malherbe, French post-impressionist.

Lintott, who died in 1950, was a resident of the United States for the last 20 years of his life, living and painting in and around New York. He was noted for his portraits, having painted such people as Leslie Howard, Lady Duff Cooper and Mrs. Cornelius V. Whitney. He was also famous for his flower paintings, landscapes and examples of still life. All of his paintings are treated with a simplicity and clarity in which the harmony of composition plays a leading role. There are 59 oils and 33 water colors and drawings in his exhibition.

William Malherbe, who paints in the great French classical tradition but with an idiom and coloring of his own, is represented by 28 paintings, most of which were done in the United States. Malherbe, whose brother Henry was a famous French music critic, was first exhibited by Gustave Kahn, one of the leaders of the French symbolist movement. Noted for his technical ability, Malherbe works in high intensity colors and his paintings show an affinity with musical composition. From here his works will go to Paris for an exhibition.

Also Exhibit

Also featured at the Museum is a group of photographs and line drawings arranged by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, most of the items loaned by Donald Willson. The group includes portraits of Munch, Koussevitzky and Muck and many other famous musical personalities.

And appearing throughout the Museum as soon as it arrives will be driftwood sculpture by Richard and Estelle Grunewald.

The Museum will sponsor a "Gay Nineties Evening" for its annual summer members' night on Friday, Aug. 3, at 7 PM. There will be people dressed in costumes of the period, refreshments and band music in a Gay Nineties cafe which will be decorated with Gibson drawings.

GIBSON EN ROUTE: This study of travelers in New York proves that Charles Dana Gibson drew something besides girls. The drawing is part of a large Gibson exhibit now showing at the Berkshire Museum.

2nd Program Presented at Tanglewood

By D. E. RITZ

Music for flute, viola da gamba and harpsichord featured the second program presented at Tanglewood Wednesday evening through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The program was given in the Theatre-Concert Hall by Georges Laurent, Alfred Zighera and Sylvia Marlowe and included music by a group of French and Italian composers and G. F. Handel. All of the composers were from the period 1687 to 1764.

Three trios played were by Antonio Lotti, J. M. Leclair and J. P. Rameau. Mr. Laurent and Miss Marlowe presented a flute and harpsichord sonata by Benedetto Marcello. Mr. Zighera and Miss Marlowe played a Handel Sonata for the viola da gamba and harpsichord and Miss Marlowe the Couperin "Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise."

The instruments, with their unusual timbres and tone qualities, recreated a period when music was the darling of the select. "Exquisite" is the word and no deep, dark passions intrude into the melodic structures to mar the gaiety of the mood. The Lotti, Marcello and Handel sonatas follow the style of the period with their slow, fast, slow, fast movement structure. The Leclair sonata replaces the second slow movement with a Sarabande and the Couperin and Rameau numbers even delved into the "program" field.

The artistry of the trio of performers, known as "The Berkshire Trio," needs no comment.

A third program in the series will be given next Wednesday by the Trio Moyse, including Marcel Moyse, flute; Blanche Honegger-Moyse, violin; and Louis Moyse, piano and flute. It will be open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, to which voluntary contributions for the support of the school constitute membership.

Charles Munch At Tanglewood

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 27. — What constitutes the main part of the Berkshire Festival began with a concert in the famous music shed here last night. Charles Munch, regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, made another debut under these circumstances. Some 7,000 people tendered him several ovations.

Fate decreed that the concert fall on what would have been the late Serge Koussevitzky's 77th birthday. In his memory the program opened in elegiac mood with Mozart's Funeral Music." Orchestra and audience stood in silent tribute after the performance.

Thereafter Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony held the audience absorbed in an outpouring of romantic music. Since Munch approached both works with considerable romantic fervor and the orchestra was keyed to brilliant virtuosity, the performances acquired an electrifying quality.

In the course of the Schumann, Munch injected so much vitality into the performance that it burst out a bit at the seams. Now tender, now robust it was primarily vigorous. With the mood secure, however, he quite captivated his audience emotionally.

Since Munch appears peculiarly attuned to all facets of Berlioz's fiery romanticism, his concept of the "Fantastic Symphony" is both vivid and theatrical. Through his incisively rhythmic punctuation and intensified phrasing, he fashioned a stunningly dramatic performance.

Berlioz has seldom been more completely served except by Munch who did so on the memorable occasion of his first performance of this work in New York some years ago.

Tanglewood Slates Opera Excerpts

The opera department of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood will present the first and fourth acts of Puccini's "La Boheme" and the first and second acts of Verdi's "Falstaff" tonight under direction of Boris Goldovsky.

Another of the week's activities at the center, as distinct from the Berkshire Festival, will be the first concert of the combined choruses tomorrow afternoon under direction of Hugh Ross and his assistant, Fred Nash Patterson. The program will include Gabrieli's "In Ecclesiis," with soloists, double chorus, organ and orchestra; "Five Proverbs on Love" by Robert Starer, for chorus a cappella; Spanish religious music, 16th Century and Catalonian folk songs arranged by Juan Maria Thomas, four Slovak songs by Bartok and Bruckner's Mass in E Minor.

Tomorrow night, the Moyse Trio will play the last of three chamber music programs made possible at the center through the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation. The group composed of father, son and daughter-in-law will play compositions by Bach, Handel, Thiriot, Ibert, Honegger, Gennaro, Martinu and Louis Moyse.

These concerts are open to friends of the Berkshire Music Center, which anyone may join.

Festival Concerts Open Thursday At Tanglewood

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 24.—The fourteenth season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6,000-seat Music Shed opens Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director.

For the next three weeks, the festival will continue with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock.

Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, August 5, and on Thursday, August 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music (K. 477), in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert. For this performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the orchestra will use two bells specially cast for Mr. Munch in France. The score calls for bells representing those of a church, but ordinarily tubular chimes are used.

Mozart Concert Attracts 5,300 to Tanglewood

By CARL E. LINDSTROM
Special to The Hartford Times

LENOX, MASS. — Time was when the pre-festival Bach-Mozart concerts were Tanglewood's most important feature, while the big shed programs drew the crowds. Saturday night's phenomenal outpouring of 5,300 listeners for an all-Mozart concert proved that this series has become as popular as it is important. In the early days such a crowd was reckoned a good one for a Sunday afternoon Brahms-Tschaikowsky concert.

I have seldom heard Mozart played with fire but that was the element which Munch imparted to the first and last movements of the Haffner Symphony and to the finale of the great E flat. To the latter Symphony's initial allegro and to the adagio which precedes the Fugue for strings were added nobility and no little passion.

This passionate quality, when discoverable, is of course inseparable from the composer's primal urge for melodic expression and perfection of design. It is an objective manis far removed from personal sentiment.

The clarity and neatness of Munch's projections handsomely illuminate music in which the design is fundamental if not paramount. A person who never has heard of the sonata form could get a very good idea of it from a single Munch performance of a Mozart symphony. His care for it was not, however, a matter of preoccupation. It was his solicitude for the melodic contour and the rhythmic force which were responsible for the essential vitality of his Mozart interpretations.

WHAT ARE YOU going to do with a piece which is pseudo-decorative and whose length exceeds its specific gravity? The divertimento was created as a back-drop for social festivity; it was for atmosphere rather than for listening. It was probably accompanied by uninterrupted gaiety and conversation in Mozart's day.

It was a tribute to the Tanglewood audience both inside and outside the Theater-Concert Hall on Sunday that the pleasing B flat Divertimento (K287) was listened to so raptly. It is simply a pretty tapestry, exquisite but hardly more than skin-deep.

I think the news here was the perfect fusing of the duo horn tones with the string choir —and the fact that a woman in the audience fainted two minutes before the end. It couldn't have been due to excitement for this is not an exciting piece; rather one to admire.

HIGH MASS got a demonstrative reception for his able and honest direction of the Missa Brevis at the Saturday night concert. He had a most helpful quartet of soloists in Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. The last-named and Miss Spector were superior.

These couldn't have been more than 50 voices in the chorus, but I have heard 200 sing with less power, certainly with less brilliance and security. It was balance which made this performance memorable — balance not only between the vocal parts, but between chorus and orchestra.

Here we have the answer to the desuetude into which choral song has fallen. Most choruses and choirs are open to anybody who feels like singing, so you can't have balance. The instrumental part is seldom properly rehearsed, either for lack of time or money, so you can't get voices and instruments into the right relationship. It is for the learning of lessons of this sort that festivals like Tanglewood have a reason for being.

SUNDAY'S SOLOIST was William Kroll, who stirred a good deal of enthusiasm with the A major violin Concerto (K219). He began diffidently and produced some unpleasant emphasis with slashing up-bow phrases. He made the slow movement delicately articulate and created his real success out of the interesting and showy finale. The audience recalled him half a dozen times.

With lowering skies and everybody momentarily expecting a downpour which did not come, Charles Munch concerned himself with making the Prague Symphony one of the most beautiful experiences of the series.

Berkshire Festival Concerts Open at Tanglewood Thursday

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., July 20 — The 14th season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6,000-seat Music Shed opens next Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks the festival will continue with concerts Thursday and Saturday at 8:15 p.m. and Sunday at 3.00 p.m.

Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5, and Thursday, Aug. 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first rate musical centre each summer.

Mr. Munch's programs for the coming week are varied and include works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of "Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevizky, Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

For the performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the orchestra will use a set of bells specially cast for Mr. Munch in France. The score calls for bells representing those of a church, but usually ordinary tubular chimes are used.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to Oberon, and continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto in conclusion. The South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, will be soloist. The concert on Sunday afternoon, July 2, will have a program consisting of Samuel Barber's Overture, The School for Scandal, Aaron Copland's The Quiet City, Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Since its beginnings in the mid-1930's, the old estate in Lenox which is now the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed into a seasonal attraction for thousands of persons who love symphonic music. Last year the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted more than 125,000 persons.

Tanglewood is also the campus of a school for young musicians, the Berkshire Music Centre, which is in its ninth season this summer. Concerts and recitals by students at the Centre are attended by upwards of 50,000 persons during the six-weeks session, all of whom become members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Centre through their voluntary contributions to the support of the school.

One of the highlights of the more than 30 musical events performed during the 1951 season will be the program next Friday, which will present the work of all departments of the Centre in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118, a chamber music group performing Schubert's Trout Quintet, a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion, a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, Pique Dame, which was to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's first venture into operatic conducting in its performance here this summer, and performances of Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, a work especially beloved by Dr. Koussevitzky and commissioned by the orchestra originally for its 50th anniversary in 1930.

The complete performances of Pique Dame by the Tanglewood opera department under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, will take on July 30 and 31. The other opera production, aside from a program of three one-act operas staged last week, will be Richard Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos on Aug. 6 and 7. Attendance at these productions is by invitation to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Centre.

Tanglewood Schedules Mozart

Munch to Direct Next Week-end

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, music director, will perform eight works by Mozart next weekend at Tanglewood, in two programs of unusual variety. With a chorus from the Berkshire Music Center, the group on Saturday, July 21, will present the "Missa Brevis, K. 192. Soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. This work will be led by Hugh Ross. In the featured work on Sunday afternoon, July 22 William Kroll will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major.

In addition to the Mass, Saturday's concert will include the Haffner Symphony, No. 35; the Symphony in E-flat, No. 39; the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, K. 546; and the Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik", K. 525. This performance of the Missa Brevis will be the first at the Berkshire Festival concerts.

NEXT SUNDAY afternoon's program consists of the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K. 287; the Violin Concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist; and the Prague Symphony, No. 38. These programs of music by the 18th Century master, Mozart, will conclude the series of six chamber orchestra concerts in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

The major Berkshire Festival concerts, held in the larger Music Shed, will begin on Thursday evening, July 26, and will continue for three weeks, with concerts on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. Mr. Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been missing his first appearances with his Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct all but two of the Shed concerts; the others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Information concerning tickets should be addressed to the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. General admission is on sale on the day of each concert, at Tanglewood.

Berkshire Tribute To Koussevitzky

LENOX, Mass.— (AP) —Instead of the customary applause some 6,000 persons stood reverently silent last night when Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, concluded his first piece at the opening of the Berkshire Music Festival.

The piece was Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, played in honor of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the 77th anniversary of Koussevitzky's birth and the first time he missed the opening of the concerts at Tanglewood's shed since it became a center of music 13 seasons ago.

Munch asked the audience not to applaud and suggested that a moment of silence be observed, instead.

Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed conductor who died last month, was in the box section of the big music shed during the first half of the program.

Music Notes

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony and Mozart's Funeral Music in memory of Serge Koussevitzky at the first concert of the Berkshire Festival in the music shed at Tanglewood Thursday evening. Saturday morning rehearsals will be open to the public beginning July 28 for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. For the Berlioz there were cast in France a bell in C and one in G, which Mr. Munch ordered in place of the tubular chimes which American orchestras usually employ for the effect of the tolling of French church bells.

IN THE SECOND concert of the A series Claudio Arrau will be the soloist in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, which will be preceded by Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. The series will end Sunday afternoon with Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Fourth Symphony, and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor.

Today Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Symphony in Mozart's Divertimento in F major for strings and two horns, Violin Concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist, and the Prague Symphony.

This morning at 10:30 o'clock at the Berkshire Music Center, tthe chamber music group will play Brahms' Quintet in B minor for clarinet and string quartet, Aaron Copland's Vitebsk (study on a Jewish theme for violin, violoncello and piano), and the Debussy Quartet in G minor. Sunday night and Friday at 4:30 students will play compositions of their colleagues.

Following his custom of presenting a special attraction during the Festival Season at Tanglewood, William Miles, director of the Berkshire Playhouse, has engaged Elisabeth Schumann to give two recitals of Lieder at the Stockbridge theatre on the afternoons of August 2 and [illegible].

One of the [illegible] singers of this generation, Elisabeth Schumann is not only the possessor of a unique voice, but most rare of all, she is a singer who also happens to be a superb musician. She has sung in all the great opera houses of the world and is unrivaled in her special field of Lieder.

Curtain time for Mme. Schumann's recitals at the Berkshire Playhouse will be 2:30. All seats will be reserved and will be available by mail or at box office of the Playhouse.

Last year the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted more than 125,000 persons.

Tanglewood is also the campus of a school for young musicians, the Berkshire Music Centre, which is in its ninth season this summer. Concerts and recitals by students at the Centre are attended by upwards of 50,000 persons during the six-weeks session, all of whom become members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Centre through their voluntary contributions to the support of the school.

One of the highlights of the more than 30 musical events performed during the 1951 season will be the program next Friday, which will present the work of all departments of the Centre in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118, a chamber music group performing Schubert's Trout Quintet, a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion, a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, Pique Dame, which was to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's first venture into operatic conducting in its performance here this summer, and performances of Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, a work especially beloved by Dr. Koussevitzky and commissioned by the orchestra originally for its 50th anniversary in 1930.

The complete performances of Pique Dame by the Tanglewood opera department under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, will take on July 30 and 31. The other opera production, aside from a program of three one-act operas staged last week, will be Richard Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos on Aug. 6 and 7. Attendance at these productions is by invitation to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Centre.

Tanglewood Schedules Mozart

Munch to Direct Next Week-end

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

The Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch, music director, will perform eight works by Mozart next weekend at Tanglewood, in two programs of unusual variety. With a chorus from the Berkshire Music Center, the group on Saturday, July 21, will present the "Missa Brevis, K. 192. Soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. This work will be led by Hugh Ross. In the featured work on Sunday afternoon, July 22 William Kroll will be soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto in A major.

In addition to the Mass, Saturday's concert will include the Haffner Symphony, No. 35; the Symphony in E-flat, No. 39; the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, K. 546; and the Serenade for String Orchestra, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik", K. 525. This performance of the Missa Brevis will be the first at the Berkshire Festival concerts.

NEXT SUNDAY afternoon's program consists of the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K. 287; the Violin Concerto in A major, William Kroll, soloist; and the Prague Symphony, No. 38. These programs of music by the 18th Century master, Mozart, will conclude the series of six chamber orchestra concerts in Tanglewood's Theatre-Concert Hall.

The major Berkshire Festival concerts, held in the larger Music Shed, will begin on Thursday evening, July 26, and will continue for three weeks, with concerts on Thursday evenings, Saturday evenings, and Sunday afternoons. Mr. Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who has been making his first appearances with his Orchestra at Tanglewood this summer, will conduct all but two of the Shed concerts; the others will be conducted by Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho. Information concerning tickets should be addressed to the box office at Tanglewood, Lenox, Massachusetts. General admission is on sale on the day of each concert, at Tanglewood.

Berkshire Tribute To Koussevitzky

LENOX, Mass.—(AP)—Instead of the customary applause some 6,000 persons stood reverently silent last night when Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, conducted [illegible] of the Berkshire Music Festival.

The piece was Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music, played in honor of the late Serge Koussevitzky.

It was the 77th anniversary of Koussevitzky's birth and the first time he missed the opening of the concerts at Tanglewood's shed since it became a center of music 13 seasons ago.

Munch asked the audience not to applaud and suggested that a moment of silence be observed, instead.

Mrs. Olga Koussevitzky, widow of the famed conductor who died last month, was in the box section of the big music shed during the first half of the program.

Music Notes

By EDGAR S. VAN OLINDA

CHARLES MUNCH, music director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct Schumann's Fourth Symphony, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony and Mozart's Funeral Music in memory of Serge Koussevitzky at the first concert of the Berkshire Festival in the music shed at Tanglewood Thursday evening. Saturday morning rehearsals will be open to the public beginning July 28 for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund. For the Berlioz there were cast in France a bell in C and one in G, which Mr. Munch ordered in place of the tubular chimes which American orchestras usually employ for the effect of the tolling of French church bells.

IN THE SECOND concert of the A series Claudio Arrau will be the soloist in Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, which will be preceded by Weber's Overture to "Oberon" and Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony. The series will end Sunday afternoon with Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Fourth Symphony, and the Cesar Franck Symphony in D minor.

Today Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Symphony [illegible] Divertimento [illegible] for strings and two horns, Violin Concerto in A major, William Kroll and [illegible] Symphony.

This morning at 10:30 o'clock at the Berkshire Music Center, tthe chamber music group will play Brahms' Quintet in B minor for clarinet and string quartet, Aaron Copland's Vitebsk (study on a Jewish theme for violin, violoncello and piano), and the Debussy Quartet in G minor. Sunday night and Friday at 4:30 students will play compositions of their colleagues.

Following his custom of presenting a special attraction during the Festival Season at Tanglewood, William Miles, director of the Berkshire Playhouse, [illegible] and Elisabeth Schumann to give two recitals of Lieder at the Stockbridge theatre [illegible] afternoons of August 2 and [illegible].

One of the great singers of this generation, Elisabeth Schumann is not only a possessor of a unique voice, but most remarkable of all, she is a singer who also happens to be a superb musician. She has sung in all the great opera houses of the world and is unrivaled in her special field of Lieder.

Curtain time for Mme. Schumann's recitals at the Berkshire Playhouse will be 2:30. All seats will be reserved and will be available at the main box office or at box office of the playhouse.

Program Announced For Nine Major Concerts At Berkshire Festival

TANGLEWOOD — The fourteenth season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6000-seat Music Shed opens this Thursday (July 26) with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3:00 o'clock. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, Aug. 5; and on Thursday, Aug. 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first-rate musical center each Summer.

Mr. Munch's program for this week is varied and include works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; and Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert. For this performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the Orchestra will be using a set of bells specially cast for Mr. Munch in France; the score of the work calls for bells representing those of a church, but it is usually ordinary tubular chimes that are used, instead of real bells.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to Oberon; continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony; and concludes with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto; the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, will be soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's Overture, The School for Scandal; Aaron Copland's The Quiet City; Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony; and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Since its beginning in the mid-1930's, the old estate in Lenox which is now the Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed into a seasonal attraction for thousands of persons who love symphonic music; last year the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted more than 125,000 persons.

In addition, Tanglewood is the campus of a unique school for young musicians, the Berkshire Music Center, which is in its ninth season this Summer. Concerts and recitals by students at the Center are attended by upwards of 50,000 persons during the six-weeks session, all of whom become members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center through their voluntary contributions to the support of the school.

One of the highlights of the more than thirty musical events performed during the 1951 season will be this Friday's program, which will present the work of all departments of the Center in a special memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. Included will be the student chorus performing the Bach Cantata No. 118; a chamber music group performing Schubert's Trout Quintet; a performance of an original work by a student in the composition department, composed for the occasion; a scene, in concert version, from Tchaikovsky's opera, Pique Dame, which was to have been Dr. Koussevitzky's first venture into operatic conducting, in its performances here this Summer; and performances of Beethoven's Egmont Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, a work especially beloved by Dr. Koussevitzky, and commissioned by the Orchestra originally for its 50th anniversary, in 1930.

The complete performances of Pique Dame, by the Tanglewood opera department under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, will take place next week, July 30 and July 31. MUNCH LAUNCHES TANGLEWOOD FETE

Conducts Opening Concert of Berkshire Music Festival—Koussevitzky Is Honored

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 26—As fate would have it, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra tonight at Tanglewood in the first of the symphonic concerts of the fourteenth Berkshire Music Festival, on the date that would have been the seventy-seventh birthday of the late Serge Koussevitzky, the musical founder of this famous festival. For twenty-five years, Mr. Koussevitzky held the Boston Symphony Orchestra at that height of technical and interpretative excellence which has given these festivals their international reputation.

The memory of Koussevitzky, who died on June 4, and his immeasurable services to the Boston Symphony and its public was observed by the performance of Mozart's Masonic Funeral Music at the beginning of the concert. Mr. Munch, in a few words from the stage, requested that the audience stand for a silent moment in homage to the departed. Thereafter he proceeded to the main works of his first festival appearance in the Music Shed with the Boston Symphony.

For this occasion he wisely chose two works for the interpretation of which he is justly celebrated. The first of these was Schumann's Fourth symphony. The second, which concluded the evening, was Berlioz' "Symphonie Fantastique," a work in the interpretation of which Mr. Munch can have had but few rivals.

Strongly Contrasted Scores

Nor would it be easy to imagine two scores more strongly contrasted in spirit and matter than these—the poetry and introspection of Schumann, the blazing and impetuous tone drama of Berlioz. In each work Mr. Munch seemed especially at home, and especially communicative. His Schumann is replete with understanding and sensitiveness which no amount of training or experience, by themselves, could have brought him. His Berlioz is even more to the manor-born and inescapably effective.

By the side of the Schumann music, the "Symphonie Fantastique" was of the more striking color and impact. The two works set each other off in a singularly effective manner. There are those who find the Munch reading of the "Fantastique" over-strenuous and so dramatic that our nerves have been drained of the power to respond to the music before it is over. For ourselves, this reading is as remarkable for its delicacy and suggestion in the passages of more subtle nature as it is for the dramatic fury of the "March to the Scaffold" movement and the finale.

Perhaps the first movement is the finest achievement of them all in its passion and poetic feeling. Every phase of its emotion, every fleeting impulse or mood is most flexibly and intuitively revealed. It is true that "The Scene in the Fields," never too easy to sustain in its appeal through the entire movement, can easily begin to drag or lose atmosphere in a big open-air auditorium; nor does it do any good to hurry its tempo a trifle to overcome this handicap. But the "March to the Scaffold" and the finale—"The Witches Sabbath"—are still of an evocative intensity and were projected with sweeping power and temperament.

At the end of the performance there was an ovation for Mr. Munch and his men from an audience of between 7,000 and 8,000.

Final Bach-Haydn-Mozart Concert Heard by 3,550

The final concert of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series lured 3,550 music-lovers to Tanglewood yesterday and brought to a record-breaking 22,900 the total number who attended the six programs which were a prelude to the major concerts scheduled to begin Thursday.

Hall Filled

Despite gloomy skies and threatening weather, the concert hall was filled to capacity and the lawns outside swarmed with listeners yesterday when Charles Munch led the Boston Symphony orchestra in [illegible] program of the series. Yesterday's concert was devoted to the works of Mozart, and included his Divertimento in B Flat Major, Concerto in A Major, and Symphony in D Major, commonly known as the Prague symphony. William Kroll, violinist, was soloist in the concerto, which drew rounds of applause.

The major concerts of the annual Berkshire Music Festival will begin Thursday night in the big music shed, where Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra in the first of the series of three programs. The Thursday program will feature Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, followed by Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

Other Events

Other Tanglewood events this week, open to Friends of the Berkshire Music center, will include a forum tonight at 8.15 o'clock in the Lenox library on the question "How can we develop a more musically cultured America?"; a song recital tomorrow afternoon at 4.30 o'clock under the direction of Ralph Berkowitz and Paul Ulanowsky; a performance by the opera department tomorrow night, directed by Boris Goldovsky; and the first concert by the combined choruses Wednesday afternoon.

In addition, the final of three chamber music concerts sponsored by the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation will be presented Wednesday evening by the Moyse Trio.

Music Festival At Its Height

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.—Following the series of Berkshire Festival programs in the theatre concert hall at Tanglewood this weekend, Charles Munch will open Series A of the nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra nert Thursday evening, July 26 in the music shed. Meantime performances will be given daily by students at the Berkshire Music Center for members of its Friends' society.

This Saturday (July 21) Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Orchestra in Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings and Symphony in E-flat, while Hugh Ross will take the baton for the "Missa Brevis" with the Festival chorus and Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Sunday afternoon Mr. Munch will conclude the Mozart series with the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, the "Prague" Symphony and the Violin Concerto in A major, with William Kroll as soloist.

The concert in the shed next Thursday will open with Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of the late Serge Koussevitzky, to be followed by Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz. For the latter Mr. Munch commissioned a special set of bells to be case in France, instead of using the tubular chimes that ordinarily represent church bells. The second program in the shed Saturday evening will include Weber's Overture to "Oberon", Sixth Symphony and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau, soloist. Series A will close Sunday afternoon with Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Fouth Symphony and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Huge Crowd Turns Out for Opera Scenes

Gate Closed Temporarily but Later Reopened

TANGLEWOOD — The popularity of the school events at Tanglewood among Friends of the Berkshire Music Center reached a new high last night at the second opera performance of the season. The staff at Tanglewood was not prepared for the large overflow audience, and when all seats (1200) in the theatre-concert hall were filled, the gate was closed for a short time, but later opened to admit members to the grounds. More than 1000 more turned up for the performance.

Commenting on the situation this morning, George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, said, "There has been no change in policy in these matters, but a certain flexibility in arrangements may be dictated from time to time. In general, however, members are eligible to come to all student performances. In case of certain events reserved tickets are issued to the capacity of the auditorium. In such cases Friends who did not apply early enough to receive reserved seats before they were exhausted, will be admitted to the grounds. Orchestral, choral and chamber music concerts present no difficulty.

"In the case of certain opera performances where people want to see as well as hear, it places a heavy strain and responsibility on our limited staff to maintain at all times free exits and free aisles. Safety must come first and those on the grounds for the opera performances who do not have reserved seat tickets, will confer a great favor on the management if they will accept readily the areas where it is considered practicable and safe for them to remain.

"The management regrets that in the interim last night a few Friends left the grounds and missed the performance."

MOZART WORKS HEARD BY 5300 AT TANGLEWOOD

Festival Chorus Under Hugh Ross Sings With Fine Precision

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, July 21 — The All-Mozart program at Tanglewood tonight by members of the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch and the Festival chorus under Hugh Ross included the Missa Brevis in F (K. 192). This short mass written when the composer was 18, is as the title implies, brief and compact, with little development, and no more repetition of the text than is needed for its musical statement. It often sounded like instrumental rather than vocal music, but highly interesting were the youthful flights into counterpoint, the closely knit part-writing and the free, spontaneous flow of melody.

Four Soloists

The excellently-trained chorus under the direction of Hugh Ross sang with the precision, secure intonation and musical assurance of fine orchestra players, starting off many of the choruses authoritatively without any orchestra preluding. The soloists, Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, all well known to audiences here, were joined by Gladys Spector, soprano, who with her warm, full, round tones and admirable musically, was a welcome addition to this gifted quartet.

All four were vocally expert and efficient in this exacting music. But it is not music in which the soloist shines as such, for the vocal line is always an integrated part of the work, usually alternating with the chorus. Altogether it was an admirable performance, and it was a wonderful experience listening to this little masterpiece.

Exciting Performance

The concert opened with a really exciting performance of the symphony in D major, "The Haffner" (K. 385). Charles Munch again demonstrated his [illegible] by being just as revealing in Mozart as he was in Bach and Haydn. In its four movements, there was in turn, an exhilarating vigor, a quiet grace, a rhythmical lift, and an elegance and fiery virtuousity. And there was the authentic Mozart "feel" throughout the symphony. An audience of 5300 received both of these works and their performances ecstatically.

After intermission the orchestra played the Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra (K. 546) and the symphony E flat (K. 543).

Plan a Memorial Concert For Serge Koussevitzky

IN ADDITION to the first of the Berkshire Festival's series of nine major concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Thursday night, there will be a special concert the following night in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The work of all departments in the Berkshire Music Center, the school for young musicians now in its ninth season, will be represented in the program.

Included will be the student chorus performing Bach's Cantata No. 118, a chamber music group in Schubert's "Trout" Quintet, an original work by a student in the composition department written for the occasion, a concert-version scene from Tschaikovski's "Pique Dame," which was to have marked Koussevitzky's first appearance as an operatic conductor in this country; Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture and Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms, a work especially beloved by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's late conductor.

Boris Goldovsky to Direct

The complete performance of "Pique Dame" by the Tanglewood opera department will begin July 30 and 31 under the direction of Boris Goldovsky. Another opera production will be Strauss' "Ariadne auf Naxos" Aug. 6 and 7. Attendance at these productions is by invitation to members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center which is composed of those who make voluntary contributions to the support of the school.

The 14th season of the Berkshire Festival's major concerts will open Thursday night with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch. Concerts Saturday night and Sunday afternoon will complete the first group called Series A.

Opening Thursday's program will be Mozart's Funeral Music, K.477, to be played in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky. Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony will be the other works. In the performance of the Berlioz symphony, the percussion section of the orchestra will use a set of bells specially cast in France for Conductor Munch. The score calls for bells representing those of a church, an effect that is usually obtained by tubular chimes instead of real bells.

Program for Saturday

Saturday's program will consist of Weber's "Oberon" Overture, the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau as soloist. Sunday afternoon's program consists of Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal;" Aaron Copland's "The Quiet City," Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Franck's Symphony in D-minor.

'Little Concert' Series Ends At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 23 — Three week-ends of music for small orchestra by the Boston Symphony at its Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood concluded yesterday, with two Mozart programs winding up the six-concert series.

Year by year, this "little concert" series preliminary to the major festival programs grows more popular, with attendance far exceeding the 1,200-seat capacity of the Theater-Concert Hall. Thousands of listeners spread acres of blankets over the lush green lawns, clad in such informal comfort that not even the threat of rain discouraged them yesterday.

Charles Munch made his bow at Tanglewood for the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series this season, and apparently has met the critical demands of audiences who would inevitably compare him with his predecessor, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, father of the Festival.

Few Revisions

With few revisions, he is following the program schedule which Dr. Koussevitsky had arranged for himself.

In the programs Saturday night and yesterday afternoon, Mr. Munch drew wonderful, tender music from his orchestra, the combination of Mozart and the Boston Symphony's strings being always a happy one.

The melodic Symphony in E-flat major was beautifully done, as was the brief Adagio and Fugue for string orchestra. Also on Saturday night's program was Mozart's Missa Brevis in F-major, with Hugh Ross conducting the Festival Chorus. Gladys Spector, new soprano soloist with the choral group, has a full, powerful and distinguished voice. Other soloists already known to Tanglewood audiences were Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass.

William Kroll was soloist yesterday in the A-major violin concerto.

Mr. Munch will conduct the first of the major concerts for full orchestra in the Tanglewood Shed at 8:15 p. m. Thursday. The program includes Schumann's Fourth Symphony; Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony; and Mozart's Funeral Music, which will be dedicated to Dr. Koussevitsky.

Mrs. Coolidge Shares Spotlight With Chamber Music Artists

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—The second of the three Wednesday evening chamber music concerts being presented at the Berkshire Music Center by Mrs. Coolidge and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress was played last night by the Berkshire Trio, of which Georges Laurent is flute, Alfred Zighera viola da gamba, and Sylvia Marlowe, harpsichord.

Their program was chosen from the composers of the era when their type of instruments was in current use: The Italians Lotti and Marcello, the German Handel and the French Leclair, Couperin and Rameau. While last night's artists made their music perfectly adequate in relation to the size of the Theatre Concert Hall, it is obviously reminiscent of its proper era by reason of the instruments and the musical material. The latter is delightfully quaint and charming but for the first two-thirds of the program proceeded without variation from largo to allegro and largo to allegro.

Mr. Laurent played a modern flute while Zighera used a genuine example of the predecessor of the violoncello and Miss Marlowe a modern reproduction of the pianoforte's counterpart. The ensemble and the tonal unity was a pleasure all the evening, each artist's individual tone being substantial in its particular genre. The tone carried amply to all parts of the hall although there is always the impression when these ancient instruments are played that the artists should wear the costumes and wigs of the day and play in the grand salon of an ancient castle.

Mr. Laurent's sonata of Marcello was played with excellent variety of tone and grace. Mr. Zighera's breadth of phrasing added immeasurably to his Handel sonata. Miss Marlowe's solo suite of Couperin was the most rewarding music of the evening. "Les Fastes de la Grande and Ancienne Menestrandise" consisted of five divisions of distinctive character which Miss Marlowe delineated and made vividly descriptive with the greatest success. This was the only offering of the evening which departed from absolute music and made possible a pictorial role and Miss Marlowe made the most of it. One momentarily forgot the brilliance of her execution while enjoying the ostentatious scenes she was conjuring up.

A delighted large audience gave them a cordial response and, at the end, joined the artists in according Mrs. Coolidge, who had been seated in the first row, genuine homage and tribute. The final concert of this series will be a program next Wednesday evening by the Trio Moyse.

Boston Orchestra to Present Mozart Works at Tanglewood

Eight works by Mozart will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Munch this week at Tanglewood, closing the preliminary Bach-Haydn-Mozart series in the Theater-Concert Hall.

At 8:15 p. m. tomorrow, the "Haffner" Symphony No. 35 and Symphony No. 39 in E Flat will be played and the Festival Chorus, with Hugh Ross conducting, will be heard in "Missa Brevis," K. 192. The other instrumental works will be the "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and the Adagio and Fugue for Strings, K. 546.

In the "Missa Brevis," soloists will be Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; Davis Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

There is particular interest for Albany music patrons in the program scheduled for 3 p. m. Sunday, for William Kroll, honorary member and consulting patron of the Albany Chamber Music Society, will make the only solo appearance of a major violinist on the Berkshire Festival program this season.

Mr. Kroll, who has won a strong following in Albany for his guest appearances as a soloist and with the Kroll Quartet for the Chamber Music Society, actually will be heard in two concerts at Tanglewood Sunday.

In the regular pre-festival series in the afternoon he will be the soloist in Mozart's Violin Concerto in A Major. The orchestra under Mr. Munch also will play the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, K. 287, and the "Prague" Symphony No 38.

At 10:30 a. m. Sunday, however, Mr. Kroll will appear in one of the special concerts open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, which anyone may join. He will direct the Festival Chamber Music Group in Brahms' Quintet in B Minor for clarinet and string quartet, Aaron Copland's study on a Jewish theme, Vitebsk for Violin, Violincello and Piano, and Debussy's Quartet in G Minor.

Students Honor Koussevitzky

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 28.—As a memorial to the late Serge Koussevitzky, who created the Berkshire Music Center, its present student body staged a special concert in the music shed last night.

All five departments of the Center participated. The event drew a much larger crowd than usually attends the regular Friday evening student concerts.

For the occasion Raymond Wilding-White of the composition department wrote a motet for women's voices and trombones designated simply as "Psalm III."

The music caught the mood of trouble at the opening more strongly than that of confidence at the end. The writing was firm, the idiom modern, and the composer conducted with marked conviction.

Representing the choral department, the student chorus sang Bach's Cantata No. 118. Five students, chief among them Audun Ravnan, pianist, played two movements from Schubert's "Trout" quintet as the chamber music department's contribution.

The opera department gave a preview of its production of Tchaikowsky's "Pique Dame" in an excerpt from Act III. The orchestra department presented Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes" most ably conducted by Lorin Maazel.

In keeping with the purpose of the concert, Leonard Berstein conducted the student orchestra in the Funeral March from Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony.

Berkshire Concert Set For Saturday

Charles Munch arrives by plane today in Boston from a series of concerts in France and Italy and will drive to Lenox to open the Berkshire Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with two [illegible] Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon. The French conductor who has completed his second season as the music director of this orchestra is taking the concerts which the late Serge Koussevitzky, previous conductor of the orchestra, had intended to lead. The programs, slightly different from those originally announced, will be as follows:

Saturday, July 7 — Bach: Brandenburg Concerto No. 3; Concerto for Three Pianos in C Major (soloists: Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, Ralph Berkowitz); Brandenburg Concerto No. 2; final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion (in memory of Serge Koussevitzky); Brandenburg Concerto No. 6; Brandenburg Concerto No. 4.

Sunday, July 8 — Bach: Cantata "Der Zufriedengestellte Aeolus" (Hugh Ross conducting); Concerto for Three Pianos in D Minor (soloists: Irving Fine, Bernard Zighera, Ralph Berkowitz); Magnificat in D.

The opening exercises of the Berkshire Music Center will take place at Tanglewood this afternoon at 3:30 and will be followed by a reception in the garden.

MOZART'S MUSIC SUPERBLY DONE AT TANGLEWOOD

Boston Symphony Ends Current Series; New Program Thursday

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, July 22 — Lowering clouds somewhat lessened the audience at this final concert of the Bach-Haydn-Mozart series, but a total of 355 music lovers were on hand to hear three superlative performances by the Boston Symphony players under the direction of Charles Munch.

Performance, Relaxation

These week end concerts have been notable for their incomparable performances and the air of relaxation and perfect rapport between audience, orchestra and conductor. Charles Munch, when he took over the direction of the orchestra, made what was perhaps the briefest speech on record. He said to the men: "Gentlemen, we will make joy."

That is just what has been done during these concerts and one may look forward to that same spirit when the concerts in the shed begin this Thursday.

Mr. Munch is quite as at home in the music of Mozart as he has been in the music of Bach and Hadyn. His pacing of each work is exact and his understanding of the musical speech is thorough. Thus, this afternoon, we heard one of the most exquisite performances of the Mozart "Divertimento in B-flat major, for strings and two horns," (k. 287) that it has been our good fortune to encounter. The work is almost a concerto for violin, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster, had full opportunity to reveal anew the beauty of his art and his musicianship. We shall not soon forget the ethereal beauty of the adagio, the elegant grace of the minuet, or the light-hearted andante which closed the work.

Kroll Is Soloist

William Kroll, violinist, was the soloist in Mozart's "Concerto in A Major" (k. 219). Mr. Kroll has devoted the greater part of his musical career to chamber music, and thus he was able to bring to this concerto just the needed intimacy. It was forthright violin playing, somewhat lacking in sensuous beauty of tone, but clean-cut and, at times, sparkling. Most effective was the final rondo, with its suggestion of Hungarian rhythms and coloring. The orchestra provided fine collaboration. There were many recalls for Mr. Kroll, which he shared with Mr. Munch and the players.

The program closed with another amazing delineation of a Mozart symphony. This time it was the "Symphony in D Major," known as "The Prague" (k. 504). Last night we heard two magnificent symphonic readings and performances by the players of the "Symphony in D Major No 35" (k. 385), and the "Symphony in E Flat Major" (k. 543). That it was called the "Prague" symphony is probably due to the fact that it was first performed in that city. It was a joyous performance we heard this afternoon. Imaginative, zestful and totally enthralling, it provided a triumphant finale to a series of concerts which have made musical history at Tanglewood and which must have made thousands of new converts to the realm of music.

PIANO SOLOIST TO BE FEATURED

Kapell To Play With Mitropoulos And Chicago Symphony At Ravinia

HIGHLAND PARK — Dimitri Mitropoulos, distinguished conductor of the New York Philharmonic, and William Kapell, brilliant American pianist, will share the Ravinia spotlight with the Chicago Symphony orchestra during the fourth week of summer concerts on the north shore.

Mitropoulos began his career as a pianist in his native Athens and for a number of years was the conductor of the Athens Symphony. After he had established a notable European reputation, he made his American debut in 1936 with the Boston Symphony orchestra. Since then he has conducted major orchestras in this country from coast to coast. From 1937 until the spring of 1949, Mitropoulos was musical director of the Minneapolis Symphony. In the autumn of 1950, he became musical director of the New York Philharmonic orchestra.

PLAYED HERE BEFORE

William Kapell, young American pianist still in his twenties, first appeared at Ravinia in 1943. Since then he has toured North and South America, Europe, Australia and Canada. In addition to his concert work and appearances with major symphony orchestras, Kapell's fame has spread as a recording artist.

On this, his fifth visit to Ravinia, he will appear as soloist Thursday night, playing the Rachmaninoff "Rhapsody on a Theme of Paganini for Piano and Orchestra" and on Sunday afternoon, the Rachmaninoff "Concerto for Piano, D Minor, No. 3, Opus 30." Kapell will return to Ravinia during the seventh week to join the Budapest string quartet in four concerts of chamber music.

PREPARES FOR SOLO

The Thursday evening program, when Kapell will be the soloist, will include Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Opus 52," Weber's "Symphony No. 1, C Major, Opus 19" and Debussy's "La Mer."

On Saturday night, Mitropoulos will conduct the orchestra in the Bach - Mitropoulos "Fantasi and Fugue, G Minor," Bizet's "Symphony No. 1 in C Major" and Rachmaninoff's "Symphony No. 2, E Minor, Opus 27."

Kapell again will be soloist Sunday afternoon and included on the program will be Beethoven's "Overture of 'Coriolanus,'" the Schumann "Symphony No. 1 in B Flat Major, Opus 38" and Ravel's "The Waltz."

Berkshire Music Festival

Charles Munch At Tanglewood

The arrival at Tanglewood of Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to conduct the Berkshire Festival, adds another personality to the list of famous men and women who have made of the Berkshires a center of culture since the middle of the last century. Residents of the county and people everywhere who are planning to attend the Festival or who have heard him conduct in concert or over the air, are wondering what sort of man has curtailed his vacation in Europe to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the concerts at its summer home on the shores of Lake Makinac in the Berkshire Hills.

Charles Munch is one of six children of Ernst Munch, an organist and professor at the Conservatory of Music in Strasbourg and the daughter of a French protestant minister in Paris. The elder Munch founded the famous choir of St. Guillaume. All his children played an instrument.

Although Munch is described as "French to his fingertips", one need not fear that his programs will contain a disproportionate number of French compositions. From his first lessons in violin with his father at the age of six, until he left Strasbourg his education in German music was so thorough that Bach, Beethoven and Brahms are as familiar to him as the Berlioz for which he is especially famous. He is said to be equally at home with the works of other nationality.

He is liked by orchestra members, audiences and critics. When he took over the directorship of the Boston orchestra, at his first rehearsal he said, "I hope we shall work very hard together — and with much joy." "I make them like what they play. I do not scold them", he told an interviewer. Though he is very kind, he has an air of authority, and they men respect him. One critic has said that the orchestra is more flexible under his leadership than it has ever been before. He is a serious, conscientious worker. Five minutes after he arrived at Tanglewood from France he was holding auditions for soloists in the Bach Magnificat, in D. Like his predecessor, he is a perfectionist.

Audiences and critics at Tanglewood, as in Boston and wherever he has conducted, are enthusiastic in their praise of his musicianship, of his manner of conducting and of the results. While some may at first complain on an absence of showmanship, "you feel", as one critic has expressed it, "that he is above it". His Bach, Haydn and Mozart have won enthusiastic praise and overflow audiences. There is every indication in the box office that the Tanglewood shed and lawns will be crowded to hear him conduct Berlioz, Brahms, Beethoven, Franck, Schumann, Tchaikovsky and contemporary composers.

Mun[illegible]nd Carvalho Conduct Se[illegible] Series at Tanglewood

By Harold Rogers

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Charles Munch is maintaining the same high standards of performance for the Berkshire Festival that he established when he conducted the Boston Symphony Or[illegible] in the Shed for the first time [illegible] ago.

[illegible] went end in the [illegible] of concerts with Sir [illegible]arty's exquisite arrangements of selections from Handel's [illegible] Music," he gave a polished [illegible] of the six sections. This [illegible] has always been associated with the out-of-doors and is especially appropriate as background for it in the open. The brass [illegible] gained a good measure of [illegible] in their difficult passages.

Saturday's performance continued with a [illegible] subjective in the composer's conception and in Mr. Munch's interpretation, of Béla Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta. This introspective score, dating from 1936, is replete with those original tonal effects that form such an impressive part of Bartók's peculiar genius.

The music is infused with a mystical quality that is nevertheless of this world, especially in the nocturne-like Adagio of the third movement. Mr. Munch handled the direction with great sensitivity.

There followed a rare performance of Ravel's Second Suite from his ballet, "Daphnis et Chloé"—rare in that the seldom-used choral parts were added. These were sung by the Festival Chorus prepared by Hugh Ross, director of the Berkshire Music Center's choral department.

The voices, used instrumentally, added considerably to the exciting brilliance of Mr. Munch's reading. He closed this program with the Saint-Saëns warhorse, the Third Symphony in C minor. Jorge Bolet, a native of Havana, made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony as soloist in Prokofiev's Piano Concerto in G minor, No. 2, written in 1912-13. This excessively difficult score is seldom heard as few pianists are able to include it in their repertoires.

But Mr. Bolet's playing not only combined technical pyrotechnics with musical lyricism; he brought the whole thing off with a casual grace that was amazing in itself. He won a bit of silent applause from the conductor for his sparkling rendition of the witty and rippling Scherzo. His cadenzas in the first and last movements were potent w[illegible]ama; his runs and trills ha[illegible]delicate clarity throughou[illegible]gned the prolonged o[illegible]nsued.

Festival Enters Its Last Lap With Busy Four-Day Programs

TANGLEWOOD — The Boston Symphony Orchestra will start the last lap of the Berkshire Festival this evening. For the next four days they will play a concert every day, with a public rehearsal Saturday morning.

After Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, their former conductor, tonight, they will relax tomorrow with a concert in a lighter vein for the benefit of their summer school, the Berkshire Music Center. Leonard Bernstein will lead them in the Mass that Dr. Koussevitzky had planned to conduct. The last two concerts of the season will be conducted by Charles Munch Saturday night and Sunday afternoon.

Boris Goldovsky, director of the opera department, has announced a change in program for tomorrow afternoon. Instead of Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball," originally scheduled for 4.30, they will play the first act from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro" and Act 3 from Puccini's "La Boheme." At 8, when the departments of the Center will be on view, scenes from four Italian operas will present: "The Masked Ball," "Rigoletto" and "Aida," all by Verdi, and Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana."

A dozen door prizes will be drawn after the gala concert, which will begin at 8.30, including a General Electric radio or its equivalent, a water color painting of Stockbridge Bowl by Karl Zeise, recordings made at Tanglewood, a baton used by Dr. Koussevitzky and his portrait, donated by Mrs. Koussevitzky, dinners for two at five Berkshire inns.

CHRISTINA CARDILLO

Christina Cardillo In Tanglewood Opera Cast of 11 Tonight

Miss Christina Cardillo of this city will sing tonight at Tanglewood when the opera department, where she is studying under a six weeks' scholarship, will present scenes from Verdi's "Falstaff."

The 23-year old soprano, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Cardillo of 149 Pleasant street, will be one of a cast of 11 students who will present the opera, attendance at which is open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and their guests.

Miss Cardillo was graduated last month from the New England Conservatory of Music at Boston and will sail next month for Europe for two years of voice study provided in a scholarship she won at graduation. She is the sister of Pasquale Cardillo, who is a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra that will present the first of the annual Berkshire Music Festival concerts Thursday night at Tanglewood.

Miss Cardillo also will take part Friday evening in a memorial concert to be presented by students of all Tanglewood departments, in honor of the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Boston Symphony To Open Concert Series July 26

Following the series of Berkshire Festival programs in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood this weekend, Charles Munch will open series A of the nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening, July 26 in the music shed. Meantime performances will be given daily by students at the Berkshire Music Center for members of its Friends' Society.

This Saturday evening, July 21, Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Orchestra in Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings and Symphony in E-flat, while Hugh Ross will take the baton for the "Missa Brevis" with the Festival chorus and Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Sunday afternoon Mr. Munch will conclude the Mozart series with the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, the "Prague" Symphony and the Violin Concerto in A major, with William Kroll as soloist.

The concert in the shed next Thursday will open with Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of the late Serge Koussevitzky, to be followed by Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz. For the latter Mr. Munch commissioned a special set of bells to be cast in France, instead of using the tubular chimes that ordinarily represent church bells. The second program in the shed Saturday evening will include Weber's Overture in "Oberon", Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau, soloist. Series A will close Sunday afternoon with Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal", Aaron Copland's "Quiet City", Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

This Friday evening, July 20, Leonard Bernstein, conductor, who heads the school's orchestra department, will conduct the second half of the concert by the student's orchestra and students of conducting will occupy the podium for the first half. Students of chamber music will present programs each Sunday morning at 10:30 and E. Power Biggs, Boston Orchestra organist, will give a recital every Saturday at 3. There will be a composers' forum Sunday evening at 8:15 and Friday afternoon, July 27, at 4:30.

Tanglewood Music Series In 14th Year

Boston Symphony To Appear Thursday Evening

The fourteenth season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's 6,000-seat Music Shed will open next Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3:00 oclock.

Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, August 5; and on Thursday, August 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first-rate musical center each Summer.

Mr. Munch's program for next week are varied and include work by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky; and Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to Oberon; continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony; and concludes with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto; the South American pianist; Claudio Arrau, will be soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's Overture, The School for Scandal; Aaron Copland's The Quiet City; Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony; and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Since its begnnings in the mid-1930's, the old estate in Lenox, which is now the Summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has developed into a seasonal attraction for thousands of persons who love symphony music; last year, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted more [illegible]5,000 persons.

N.A. Transcript

20,000 at Tanglewood; Beach Attire Still Appears

Some extremely informal attire was noted among the more than 20,000 persons who attended the concerts Saturday night and yesterday afternoon, winding up the second week of the three-week Berkshire Symphonic festival season at Tanglewood, Lenox.

Despite Hint

Despite the management's gentle hint last week when wrap-around skirts were offered for the use of women guests wearing slacks and shorts, and despite the coolness of the weather, a great many women guests appeared in attire considered more appropriate to a beach outing than to a dignified occasion like the Tanglewood concerts. One young woman was seen, standing in the aisle and applauding madly, dressed in dungarees and "sloppy Joe" shirt, and barefoot.

Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian conductor, made his only appearance of the season as conductor yesterday afternoon, before an audience of more than 9,000. He directed the Boston Symphony orchestra in Guarnieri's Symphony No. 2; Prokofieff's Piano Concerto No. 2 with Jorge Bolet as piano soloist; and Moussorgsky-Ravel's "Pictures at an Exhibition."

In Saturday night's concert, when an audience of 11,000 established a record for this season, Charles Munch led the orchestra in six pieces from the set of 20 which constitute Handel's "Water Music"; the Music for Strings and Percussion of Bartok; Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" (Suite No. 2); and Saint-Saens' Symphony No. 3 with organ.

UN Group Attends

In the audience yesterday were 225 members of the UN secretarial staff, enjoying their annual week-end as guests in Berkshire homes; and a group of 40 foreign students attending Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The final three concerts of the festival series will begin Thursday night with the performance Conducted by Leonard Bernstein, Conducted by Leonard Bernstein, the concert will be in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and will be Mr. Bernstein's only appearance this season as conductor in a regular festival concert.

Soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass, with E. Power Biggs as organist.

Saturday night, the program will include the Symphony No. 1 of Beethoven; Honegger's Fifth symphony; and Tchaikovsky's Sixth ("Pathetique") Symphony.

The final concert, Sunday afternoon will be devoted to the music of Brahms, and will include his "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," and the Second and Fourth symphonies.

"Tanglewood on Parade"

Friday night will be the annual "Tanglewood On Parade" night, for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center school. Demonstrations will be given of the work of advanced students in all departments, starting at 6 o'clock, with a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the music shed at 8:30. Conductors for this special concert will be Mr. Munch, Mr. Bernstein, Mr. de Carvalho, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra.

Ruth Posselt will be violin soloist in the two works conducted by her husband, Mr. Burgin.

Included in the program will be the overture of "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz; Bloch's "Nigun," for violin and orchestra; Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue"; and Debussy's "La Mer."

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak briefly before the program.

Tanglewood On Parade This Fri.

Charles Munch, will share the conducting with three men also familiar to Boston Symphony audiences, this Friday evening in a special concert held for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. This program will be the feature of "Tanglewood on Parade," and the proceeds are earmarked for the summer school for young musicians maintained at Tanglewood by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Friday evening's program will begin with Berlioz' Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," with Eleazar de Carvalho conducting. Richard Burgin will conduct the next two works: Bloch's "Nigun," for Violin and Orchestra, and Arbos' "Tango Espagnol," and his wife, an established concert violinist, Ruth Posselt, will be soloist in both. Then Leonard Bernstein will play and conduct Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," for Piano and Orchestra. Following this, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, a good friend of Tanglewood, will speak to the audience briefly. Charles Munch will conduct the closing work of the concert, Debussy's "La Mer," (The Sea).

As in the past, "Tanglewood on Parade" also provides an opportunity for ticket purchasers to attend the activities of the students at the Berkshire Music Center. All departments will be performing varied programs in their specialities, from six o'clock on, and for purchasers of box seats and reserved seats, the opera department will stage, at 4:30 p. m., a special production of "Amelia Goes To The Ball," by Menotti. There will also be waltzing on the lawn, and a door prize, as yet to be announced.

ALL TANGLEWOOD JOINS IN CONCERT

Berkshire Music Center Units Give Program in Memory of Serge Koussevitzky

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to The New York Times.

LENOX, Mass., July 27—The concert given tonight by members of all the departments of the Berkshire Music Center in memory of Serge Koussevitzky was an impressive illustration of the variety and scope of the work of the music which he founded and developed with his heart's blood.

The occasion opened with the performance by the chorus, conducted by John Krueger, of the Bach cantata, "O Jesus Christ, Meins Lebens Licht," and closed with Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," directed by Lorin Maazel. The classes in composition, conducting, ensemble and opera took part.

The Schubert "Trout" quintet was played by Jeanne Sandbark, violin; Anne Denton, viola; Moshe Amitray, 'cello; David Moore, double bass, and Audun Ravnan, pianist. Raymond Wilding-White directed the performance of his own "Psalm III, Motet for Women's Voices and Trombones." The piece shows strongly the Stravinsky influence, and is written with skill and conviction. Its problems of intonation and of rhythmic flexibility were excellently surmounted.

Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department, conducted a scene from the third act of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," with Phyllis Curtin as Lisa and David Lloyd as Herman.

This opera will be performed in its entirety on stage next Monday night and can then be reported.

After the intermission, Leonard Bernstein conducted the student's orchestra in the slow movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. As with all the other performances of the evening, this one was applauded to the echo, when it would have been more fitting if silence had followed this tribute of the greatest symphonic elegie ever composed to the memory of one of the most distinguished musicians of our time.

Finally came Stravinsky's symphony of Psalms, with its singular combination of a certain hard icon-like immobility and a savage primitism and depth of feeling fully communicated by Mr. Maazel. He penetrated to the essence of the music and conveyed it with a master hand.

Charles Munch Directs Concerts This Weekend

At least one musical event nearly every day, and some times three, is scheduled for the coming week at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With concerts in the theatre-concert hall by members of the Boston orchestra, Charles Munch conducting, Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon, students and faculty of the school and the Berkshire Trio will perform for the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center.

The two Festival concerts will be devoted to the music of Haydn. Saturday night's program will include the Symphonic Concertante for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon, the "London" and G major symphonies and the Piano Concerto in D major, with Seymour Lipkin piano soloist. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the cello solo in the Violoncello Concerto Sunday, when the program will include the "Drum Roll", "Clock" and "Oxford" Symphonies.

Eleazar deCarvalho, Brazilian conductor who will lead the Boston orchestra in the August 5 program of the Festival, will conduct the student orchestra in its second concert of the season Friday evening (July 13). Sunday morning the students will play chamber music and hold a "composers' forum" in the evening, performing the works of their colleagues who are studying with Aaron Coplan, Irving Fine and Luigi Dallapiccola, who came from Italy to teach composition at the school.

The first opera program to be given under Boris Goldovsky's direction Tuesday evening, will be Mozart's "The Impresario", Stravinsky's "Mavra" and Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge", all having their first Tanglewood performance.

The Berkshire Trio, whose chamber music concert Wednesday evening is one of a series of three, gift of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress, will feature early French music. The program was chosen to celebrate the founding of Paris 2000 years ago.

Composed of George Laurent, flute, Alfred Zighera, viola de gamba, members of the Boston Orchestra, and the school faculty, and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, the Trio will play the Sonata in G (Lotti), Sonata in F (Marcello), Sonata in C (Haendel), Sonata a trois (Leclair), Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise (Couperin) and Troisieme Concert (Rameau).

Mr. Munch will conduct two Mozart programs the following Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon (July 21 and 22) and will open the three weekends of nine concerts in the shed with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra July 26.

Evening performances will start at 8:30, afternoon at 3 and morning at 10:30. Tickets for Festival concerts in the shed are on sale at Tanglewood, Lenox, England Brothers, Pittsfield and Blue Bird Shop, Stockbridge. Voluntary contributions to the Music Center for the support of the school, constituting membership in the Friends Society, are received at the Tanglewood office. Information will be mailed on request.

Beethoven Mass Performed In Memory of Koussevitzky

Bernstein Leads Orchestra, Organ And Voices in Dramatic Rendition Of the Moving 'Missa Solemnis'

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Ten years ago last night, lacking five days, the Beethoven "Missa Solemnis" was performed in the Music Shed at Tanglewood with Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Last night "in memory of Serge Koussevitzky" Leonard Bernstein conducted the same "solemn mass for orchestra with organ, chorus, and four solo voices." The Boston Symphony Orchestra with organ, played by E. Power Biggs, the Festival chorus, trained by Hugh Ross, and Adele Addison, soprano, Eunice Alberts, contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, gave an inspired performance.

It became apparent from the very start that Bernstein instinctively and, no doubt, because of the nature of the occasion, was following Beethoven's admonition to play "mit Andacht," for intense devotion could be sensed in the opening Kyrie and never during the whole long mass did the vibrancy and almost dramatic vividness diminish. It was a [illegible] trained chorus and prepared performance. The clarity of the details such as sudden soft and quiet notes following more bravado passages, which are so typically Beethoven, the inflections of small crescendos, not to speak of the growing power of larger ones, and the general grandeur and magnificance were all achieved in the spirit of the composer at his most mature and sublime.

Bernstein made an innovation in the placing of the soloists last night. Instead of practically burying them within the surrounding orchestra, he placed them at the very back of the stage and at the top of the chorus's bleachers. The results were thoroughly favorable, for their voices came through distinctly in all cases and they were able to use whatever manner of singing was required and have it conveyed to the audience most satisfactorily. There was an opulence to the solos that gave the whole rendition an added distinction. Lloyd's warm tenor issued from the initial choral utterance of "Kyrie," followed in the next phrase by the similar emergence of Miss Addison's glowing soprano and, in turn, by Miss Alberts' round contralto. Bernstein's control of the chorus — creating a strong entrance each time, yet allowing the sole to enter without forcing — was an earnest of what the whole evening was to be.

Bernstein's chief aim and main accomplishment was to recreate Beethoven, and he was eminently successful. The great mass is not really a solemn one; it rises to the heights Beethoven has surpassed in rare, if any, other works. The orchestral prelude in the sanctus, majestically played, is in the manner of the last quartets. The demands on the chorus are relentless and severe. Bernstein sometimes demanded tone from the chorus to the point of stridency, but it was only an indication of the degree of his conviction.

In the credo, Beethoven leads up to one of the most involved pieces of choral writing to be found in the literature when he requires canonic entrances in intricate rhythms at merciless speeds. Bernstein never yielded to mere corporal capacity in his urge to imbue the performance with spirit. The results always justified the means, for it was a deeply moving experience. Bernstein's conception had broad perspective and shape. It had the inner consecration that prompted Beethoven to write on the title page "Von Herzen—Moge es zu Herzen gehen." It was truly heart-felt.

Evidently some in the audience had not read the printed request not to applaud and others no doubt found it difficult to check what must have been a natural and spontaneous reaction. Bernstein's intermission and final exits were in a strangely awed atmosphere broken by sporadic and hesitant applause which quickly dissolved and ceased.

Second Opera Is Heard at Tanglewood

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

TANGLEWOOD—The opera department of the Berkshire Music Center offered its final exhibit of the season last night (which they will repeat tonight) when they presented Richard Strauss "Ariadne auf Naxos," an opera in one act with a prologue and an entr'acte with dialogue by Eugene Haun. The stage direction had been prepared by Boris Goldovsky, head of the Center's opera department and Sarah Caldwell, his assistant. Miss Caldwell conducted the opera. Some of the principal roles will be sung tonight by an exchange of singers although the greater share of the cast will continue through the two presentations.

There are few opera texts that do not strain one's credulity. This one, however, requires greater cohesion in direction than was apparent last night, as well as in acting to prevent letting the seams show. The music and the singing made substantial amends for the weaknesses in these other components of the opera. Miss Caldwell's orchestra was allowed to play without sufficient restraint in the prologue and made the task of the vocalists extra energus. In the main body of the opera this overnight was rectified and the prima donna, Gladys Spector, last night, and Zerbinetta, Jacqueline Bazinet, were heard to their best advantage. Georgiana Bannister, as the composer in the prologue, would have benefitted by the same discretionary assistance. Raymond Smolober as Bacchus, was a stunning hero in appearance as well as in voice.

The music is rich and generous. Strauss has lavished all his genius and experience on the score and although it calls for but a small skeletonized orchestra he achieves extravagant effects in that department, while giving the voices bounteous amends. The scene of Ariadne with her three attendant nymphs is long and arduous and very difficult to keep from getting static. It is almost too much to expect a newly-assembled group not entirely of professionals to achieve mature confidence in such a situation. In the vocal assignments there was much more success and the little entr'acte was witty and extremly well done.

33 Events Scheduled At Tanglewood

Thirty-three musical events are planned at Tanglewood for the ninth season of the summer school of the Boston Symphony Orchestra between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass. Beginning Friday evening, July 6 with a symphony orchestra by the students or orchestral music, performances will be open to members of the Society of Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, whose contributions support the school.

Leonard Bernstein has cancelled plans for a summer in Mexico in order to assume Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's work as head of the department of orchestral conducting and orchestra, and to conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Aug. 9.

Student programs will include orchestral concerts on Friday evenings at 8:15 in the music shed; three chamber music concerts on Wednesday evenings, beginning July 18, the gift of Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge; chamber music on Sunday mornings at 10:30; organ recitals by E. Power Biggs, organist for the Boston orchestra; and opera performances.

A few seats are available for the Bach, Haydn and Nozart week ends, when Charles Munch, Boston orchestra music director, will conduct a chamber orchestra composed of its members on three Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons, beginning July 7. Tickets are on sale at the box office, Tanglewood and England Brothers, Pittsfield, for the concerts in the shed by the full orchestra on Thursday and Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons beginning July 26. Details of programs and admission to all events will be mailed by application to Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

BSO Woman Harpist To Play At Benefit Program Tomorrow

OLIVIA HALL LUETCKE — Plouffe

For the first time in 13 years the Boston Symphony Orchestra has a woman harpist who is a regular member. Olivia Hall Luetcke, who will play one of the important parts in Debussy's "La Mer" tomorrow evening in the gala concert in Tanglewood on Parade, was engaged in May to play second harp.

A pupil of Bernard Zighera, pianist and first harpist with the orchestra, she began to study at the age of six, perhaps because her father, not a musician, was a friend of Mr. Zighera. A student at Tanglewood in the first two seasons of the Berkshire Music Center, she played with the New England Conservatory in Boston, the National in New York and the San Antonio Orchestras before joining the Boston group.

In the Pops and Esplanade concerts she is first harpist, while her teacher is on the Tanglewood faculty. In her spare time she raises German Shepherds at her Kleinhans Kennels in Scituate.

Bernstein Conducts Tomorrow In Only Festival Appearance

TANGLEWOOD—Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" tomorrow evening at Tanglewood in memory of his teacher and close friend, Serge Koussevitzky. It will be Mr. Bernstein's only appearance as guest conductor of the orchestra this season.

"Missa Solemnis" was first performed in 1823 in St. Petersburg, under the patronage of Prince Nicholas Galitzin, written by Beethoven for the ceremony of the installation of the Archduke Rudolph of Austria to the position of archbishop of Olmutz. He composed it voluntarily, and not as a commission or on request. The actual ceremony of the installation took place in March 1820, but the mass was not ready until 1823.

A native of Lawrence, Mr. Bernstein attended Harvard University and the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia. At Tanglewood since the opening season of the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, he spent the first two seasons as a conducting pupil of Dr. Koussevitzky. Since 1946 he has been a member of the conducting faculty. He canceled a leave of absence to Mexico this season to head the conducting and orchestra department and to conduct the memorial concert.

In 1943-1944 he was assistant conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society and from 1945 to 1948 director of the New York City Symphony. He has conducted orchestras abroad and in the United States during the summer and winter seasons. A composer as well as pianist and conductor, he has written "Jeremiah," a symphony with a piano solo, the ballets "Fancy Free" and "Facsimile," the Broadway musical, "On the Town," incidental music for "Peter Pan," a clarinet sonata and the song cycles, "Five Kid Songs," "I Hate Music" and "La Bonne Cuisine."

The solo parts will be sung by artists familiar to Tanglewood audiences, all former students who have appeared there with the orchestra, Festival chorus and in operatic productions. Adele Addison will sing the soprano part; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. E. Power Biggs will play the organ part.

Tickets are on sale for all Festival concerts at the box office, Tanglewood, Lenox and England Brothers, Pittsfield.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt To Speak That Evening

On the program for Tanglewood on Parade, the annual benefit that will be held on Friday, August 10, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's summer home, will be four conductors and Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt. At 6 the Berkshire Music Center, for which the benefit will be given, will be on view, with performances by orchestral, chamber music, opera and choral departments. At 4:30 those holding reserved section and box seats will be invited to a special performance of Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball", as a bonus.

The evening's concert will start at 8:30, when Eleazar de Carvalho, Brazilian conductor, will lead the Boston Orchestra in Berlioz' Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini". Richard Bufgin, associate conductor and concert master, will conduct Bloch's Nigun, for Violin and Orchestra and Arbos' Tango Espagnol, with Ruth Posselt, his wife, as soloist. Leonard Bernstein will conduct and play the solo part in George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" for Piano and Orchestra.

After a short address by Mrs. Roosevelt, Charles Munch, music director of the orchestra, will conduct it in Debussy's "The Sea" (Three Orchestral Sketches).

Picnic parties will be welcome in the interval from about 7 until the beginning of the concert. The evening will conclude with the drawing of door prizes and waltzing on the lawn. All proceeds will go toward the support of the school, conductors and musicians donating their talents.

The weekend concerts will conclude the 1951 Berkshire Festival. Mr. Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis Thursday evening, August 9, in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra in Beethoven's First Symphony, the Fifth of Honegger and the Sixth ("Pathetique") of Tchaikovsky Saturday evening. He will conduct an all-Brahms program Sunday afternoon at 3: Variations on a Theme by Haydn and the Second and Fourth Symphonies.

Saturday morning at 10 the orchestra will hold a public rehearsal for the benefit of its pension fund. Saturday afternoon at 3, for the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center there will be a student orchestral concert and Sunday at 10, chamber music. A feature of Saturday's program will be the performance of a work by Luigi Dallapiccola, Italian composer who came from Florence to teach at Tanglewood.

Tickets for Festival concerts, the benefit and the rehearsal, and information on all events are available at the box office, Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Amusements

The final three concerts of [illegible] Shed series at Tanglewood will begin next Thursday evening with the performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be led in the performance by Leonard Bernstein and the concert will be in memory of Serge Koussevitzky. The soloists will be Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. E. Power Biggs will be organist.

Following the Thursday evening concert, the last two regular Saturday concerts of this Fourteenth Berkshire Festival will be devoted to the playing of symphonies. Saturday evening Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will again conduct, in a program consisting of Beethoven's First Symphony, Honegger's Fifth Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's Pathetique (Sixth) Symphony. Sunday afternoon, Mr. Munch will lead the Orchestra in an all-Brahms concert, including the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Second and Fourth Symphonies.

SOCIETY: Tanglewood Readies for Rousing Finale on Week-End

By MARJORIE W. SHERMAN

Thousands of the nation's most privileged music lovers are in the Berkshires this week for four days noted for extraordinary concerts. Last night, tomorrow, and Sunday mark the final concerts of the Tanglewood series.

Tonight there will be a special program of the Berkshire Music Center, "Tanglewood on Parade." Conductors are Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho.

Last night's memorable program presented the Missa Solemnis of Beethoven in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, and the hundreds who stood within the great music shed or on the hushed lawns beyond were filled with the memory of the loved figure who founded these remarkable Tanglewood concerts and so often stood on that far, lighted platform.

Among the many there who remember Tanglewood from the first are Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Henry Cabot, president of the symphony trustees; and listening from the lawn, Dr. and Mrs. Lewis Perry, composer Aaron Copeland, Mrs. Richard Grandin and her sister-in-law, Isabelle Grandin, the Edward Tafts, Mrs. Alvan Fuller, Mrs. Allan Forbes, the Albert Titcombs and many more.

PREPARE ANNUAL MUSIC FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD

Extravaganza Will Benefit Berkshire Music Center, Friday — Eleanor Roosevelt to Speak at Event

CONCERT, OPERA TO BE FEATURED

The complete program for "Tanglewood on Parade," the annual event to be held Friday at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., for the benefit of the Berkshire music center has been announced for this great affair.

Eleazar deCarvalho will open the evening concert at 8:30 with Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra will conduct Bloch's "Nigun, for Violin and Orchestra" and Arbos' tango Espagnol, with his wife, Ruth Posselt, playing the solo parts. Leonard Bernstein will conduct and play the solo part in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," for piano and orchestra.

At the intermission of the musical program, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak for 10 minutes. The program will conclude with Debussy's "La Mer," three orchestral sketches: "From Dawn to Moon on the Sea," "Play of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea."

All ticket holders will be invited to attend the activities of the school at six, with students performing in the symphony orchestra opera, chorus and chamber music. Those with reserved section and box seats will have an additional invitation to a special performance of Menotti's opera, "Amelia Goes to the Ball" at 4:30 in the theater-concert hall.

Tickets are on sale at the box office, Tanglewood and England Bros. in Pittsfield.

Notes and Footnotes

AROUND South Berkshire the current New Yorker magazine sold out in almost nothing flat, and for good reason. It carried a full-page drawing of a concert crowd at Tanglewood sprawled out on the lawns, and was the work of Gluyas Williams. We checked with George Judd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra staff, and learned that Mr. Williams works well in advance. He visited Tanglewood last summer, and though he apparently made not a drawing, came up with a fine batch of typical characters from memory. The association of the two men, incidentally, is a long one. They were classmates at Harvard, graduating together in 1911. Mr. W., did his first cartooning for the Harvard Lampoon, worked on the Youth's Companion in Boston, and about 30 years ago did illustrations for the Boston Pops programs. They were used for all of 20 years. He also illustrated a gently satrical book on musicians, "People of Note," by Laurence McKinney in 1940 that ran through 17 printings. Mr. W. likes music a lot, and Mr. Judd cannot imagine why he has attended Tanglewood only that once.

Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique' On Shed Program Tomorrow

TANGLEWOOD — Charles Munch wil conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three symphonies tomorrow evening in the 14th Berkshire Festival concert. The eighth program in the Shed, it will include Beethoven's First Symphony, Arthur Honegger's fifth and Tchaikovsky's sixth ("Pathetique").

Ludwig van Beethoven presented his First Symphony in 1800, at the age of 30, in Vienna in a concert "for his own benefit." It completed a program of a Mozart symphony, airs from Haydn's "Creation" and one of his own piano concertos, in which he played the solo part.

The second number on tomorrow evening's program was written by Honegger for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and was dedicated to the memory of Natalia Koussevitzky. Completed last December in Paris, it was introduced in Boston and New York by Mr. Munch. Dr. Koussevitzky had intended to introduce it to Tanglewood. It was to see his friend, Arthur Honegger that Mr. Munch made his first visit to the Berkshires in the fall of 1947. He did not return until this season to conduct the Festival. Mr. Honegger had come to the United States to teach composition at Tanglewood in the 1947 season, but suffered a heart attack a week after he arrived, and remained in Lenox until the winter.

Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony was written and first performed at St. Petersburg in 1893. He wrote to his uncle, to whom he was to dedicate the work, "I certainly regard it as quite the best, and especially the most sincere of all my works. I love it as I never loved any one of my musical offspring before."

The last public rehearsal of the season for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund will be held tomorrow morning at 10. Tomorrow afternoon at 3 the student symphony orchestra will play a concert of modern music, including three works by teachers of composition at the Berkshire Music Center and one by a composition student. The program will be followed by the award of student prizes and a party in the garden for students, faculty, staff and families.

Sour Blue Notes Sounded On Alleged Reds in Music.

By William Harry Widener.

In a letter to you July 12 Frederic Vonn suggested that American composers might further the cause of American music and also honor the memory of Serge Koussevitsky by contributing financial support to the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Vonn then declared that it is heartening to learn that this year the Berkshire Music Center will continue under the "able administration of Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland."

Aaron Copland is cited as having been a sponsor, a member or an affiliate of 21 subversive organizations, most of which are on the Attorney General's list Copland was a sponsor and panel speaker at the Communist-dominated Waldorf Peace Conference in 1949. Copland was affiliated with the Committee of Professional Groups for Browder and Ford, Communist candidates for President and Vice President of the United States. Copland was a signer of open letters for Harry Bridges and Morris U. Schappes, two convicted Communist perjurers. If there ever was any doubt about Coplanu's pro-Communist and pro-Soviet attitude it was dispelled at the time the Soviet Union declared war on Finland. Copland is cited as having signed a telegram to President Roosevelt demanding that the Congress of the United States should declare war on Finland.

Leonard Bernstein's record is equally a story of art-and-un-American politics. Bernstein was affiliated with the Committee for re-election of Benjamin J. Davis, one of the 11 convicted Communist leaders. Bernstein was signer of the protest against the deportation of Hanns Eisler. In 1949 Bernstein was affiliated with the Civil Rights Congress, which organization presently is defying both the courts and the government of the United States. Bernstein is cited as having been a sponsor, a member or an affiliate of more than 17 organizations, most of which are on the Attorney General's list. Manhattan.

St. Louisans At Music Festival

By
MRS. WILLIAM DEE BECKER

LENOX, MASS., Aug. 7.

HOTELS and houses for miles around this New England town are filled with music lovers from all over the world, attracted by the Berkshire Festival. Many languages are heard in the natural amphitheater in the hills where the Boston Symphony plays to huge cosmopolitan audiences.

Not only the music but beautifully dressed women contributed to an auspicious opening night. Center of attention was French Ambassador Henri Bonnet and Mme. Bonnet, who lived up to her reputation for smart gowns by wearing a strapless black and silver lame dress with an enormous stole to match. In their box were the famous violinist, Albert Spalding, and Mrs. Spalding.

In the intermission, the Bonnets paid their respects to Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who sat in a nearby box, dressed in periwinkle blue.

Mrs. James Martin Nelson is here for the series and has been joined by Mrs. Kenneth G. Carpenter, who now lives in Connecticut but has come down from her summer place in Maine. Another former St. Louisan who is enjoying the concerts is Mrs. Benjamin G. Chapman, who divides her time between Bennyfield, the Chapman summer home in East Hampton, L.I., and Arizona. Mrs. Chapman's sister-in-law, Mrs. Louise Bowen of Detroit, is spending a month as her guest at East Hampton and she, too, is here for the music. Miss Eunice Smith of Alton, long a patron of the arts, is here with a college friend from the East, and the other day we met Mrs. Rose Jonas.

The location for the festival is ideal, for it is set among green hills in the Stockbridge Bowl, which has a lake in the center. Tall old trees and beautiful estates add to its charm. The surrounding towns date from the eighteenth century.

LENOX, so say its natives, was a rival of Newport in the gay '90s, and that may well be true considering the show places with their spacious grounds and huge stables. The Carnegies, Tappans, Bullards and Vanderbilts are but a few of the well known families who spent part of each year here.

Elm Court was built by Commodore Vanderbilt and still belongs to the family. It is fascinating because of its original furnishings, grounds and greenhouses famous for espaliered fruit trees, and is a delightful place to stay.

Dr. and Mrs. M. Hayward Post held open house Friday night at their summer home in Pleasant Valley. The house has been in Mrs. Post's family for four generations and not only is lovely from the exterior but is filled with original accouterments. The party was large and delightful, with the guest list made up of their many friends who spend their summers in this part of the country.

The Posts' son, Martin, who is here for a two-week vacation, invited a group of young persons, one of whom was John Franciscus, who is on a holiday from college.

The Curtis Hotel here in Lenox has perhaps the largest number of guests for the Berkshire season, and Friday night Dr. I. D. Kelley was staying there, seeking accommodations for Mrs. Kelley and himself for a later concert series.

I am sorry to leave this delightful place, but Cape Cod, with a different sort of charm, is next on my list, and a column will be coming from there.

Thousands of the nation's most privileged music lovers are in the Berkshires this week for four days noted for extraordinary concerts. Last night, tomorrow, and Sunday mark the final concerts of the Tanglewood series.

Tonight there will be a special program of the Berkshire Music Center, "Tanglewood on Parade." Conductors are Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho.

Last night's memorable program presented the Missa Solemnis of Beethoven in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, and the hundreds who stood within the great music shed or on the hushed lawns beyond were filled with the memory of the loved figure who founded these remarkable Tanglewood concerts and so often stood on that far, lighted platform.

Among the many there who remember Tanglewood from the first are Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Henry Cabot, president of the symphony trustees; and listening from the dawn, Dr. and Mrs. Lewis Perry, composer Aaron Copeland, Mrs. Richard Grandin and her sister-in-law, Isabelle Grandin, the Edward Tafts, Mrs. Alvan Fuller, Mrs. Allan Forbes, the Albert Titcombs and many more.

Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique' On Shed Program Tomorrow

TANGLEWOOD — Charles Munch wil conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three symphonies tomorrow evening in the 14th Berkshire Festival concert. The eighth program in the Shed, it will include Beethoven's First Symphony, Arthur Honegger's fifth and Tchaikovsky's sixth ("Pathetique").

Ludwig van Beethoven presented his First Symphony in 1800, at the age of 30, in Vienna in a concert "for his own benefit." It completed a program of a Mozart symphony, airs from Haydn's "Creation" and one of his own piano concertos, in which he played the solo part.

The second number on tomorrow evening's program was written by Honegger for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and was dedicated to the memory of Natalia Koussevitzky. Completed last December in Paris, it was introduced in Boston and New York by Mr. Munch. Dr. Koussevitzky had intended to introduce it to Tanglewood. It was to see his friend, Arthur Honegger that Mr. Munch made his first visit to the Berkshires in the fall of 1947. He did not return until this season to conduct the Festival. Mr. Honegger had come to the United States to teach composition at Tanglewood in the 1947 season, but suffered a heart attack a week after he arrived, and remained in Lenox until the winter.

Tchaikovsky's Sixth Symphony was written and first performed at St. Petersburg in 1893. He wrote to his uncle, to whom he was to dedicate the work, "I certainly regard it as quite the best, and especially the most sincere of all my works. I love it as I never loved any one of my musical offspring before."

The last public rehearsal of the season for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund will be held tomorrow morning at 10. Tomorrow afternoon at 3 the student symphony orchestra will play a concert of modern music, including three works by teachers of composition at the Berkshire Music Center and one by a composition student. The program will be followed by the award of student prizes and a party in the garden for students, faculty, staff and families.

Conredo di Savonarola, one of three "Songs From Captivity" concerning Mary Queen of Scots, Savonarola and Boethius ..... Dallapiccola (teacher)

Sour Blue Notes Sounded On Alleged Reds in Music.

By William Harry Widener.

In a letter to you July 12 Frederic Vonn suggested that American composers might further the cause of American music and also honor the memory of Serge Koussevitsky by contributing financial support to the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Vonn then declared that it is heartening to learn that this year the Berkshire Music Center will continue under the "able administration of Leonard Bernstein and Aaron Copland."

Aaron Copland is cited as having been a sponsor, a member or an affiliate of 21 subversive organizations, most of which are on the Attorney General's list Copland was a sponsor and panel speaker at the Communist-dominated Waldorf Peace Conference in 1949. Copland was affiliated with the Committee of Professional Groups for Browder and Ford, Communist candidates for President and Vice President of the United States. Copland was a signer of open letters for Harry Bridges and Morris U. Schappes, two convicted Communist perjurers. If there ever was any doubt about Copland's pro-Communist and pro-Soviet attitude it was dispelled at the time the Soviet Union declared war on Finland. Copland is cited as having signed a telegram to President Roosevelt demanding that the Congress of the United States should declare war on Finland.

Leonard Bernstein's record is equally a story of art-and-un-American politics. Bernstein was affiliated with the Committee for re-election of Benjamin J. Davis, one of the 11 convicted Communist leaders. Bernstein was signer of the protest against the deportation of Hanns Eisler. In 1949 Bernstein was affiliated with the Civil Rights Congress, which organization presently is defying both the courts and the government of the United States. Bernstein is cited as having been a sponsor, a member or an affiliate of more than 17 organizations, most of which are on the Attorney General's list. Manhattan.

AROUND South Berkshire the current New Yorker magazine sold out in almost nothing flat, and for good reason. It carried a full-page drawing of a concert crowd at Tanglewood sprawled out on the lawns, and was the work of Gluyas Williams. We checked with George Judd of the Boston Symphony Orchestra staff, and learned that Mr. Williams works well in advance. He visited Tanglewood last summer, and though he apparently made not a drawing, came up with a fine batch of typical characters from memory. The association of the two men, incidentally, is a long one. They were classmates at Harvard, graduating together in 1911. Mr. W., did his first cartooning for the Harvard Lampoon, worked on the Youth's Companion in Boston, and about 30 years ago did illustrations for the Boston Pops programs. They were used for all of 20 years. He also illustrated a gently satirical book on musicians, "People of Note," by Laurence McKinney in 1940 that ran through 17 printings. Mr. W likes music a lot, and Mr. Judd cannot imagine why he has attended Tanglewood only that once.

PREPARE ANNUAL MUSIC FESTIVAL AT TANGLEWOOD

Extravaganza Will Benefit Berkshire Music Center, Friday — Eleanor Roosevelt to Speak at Event

CONCERT, OPERA TO BE FEATURED

The complete program for "Tanglewood on Parade," the annual event to be held Friday at Tanglewood in Lenox, Mass., for the benefit of the Berkshire music center has been announced for this great affair.

Eleazar deCarvalho will open the evening concert at 8:30 with Berlioz' overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra will conduct Bloch's "Nigun, for Violin and Orchestra" and Arbos' tango Espagnol, with his wife, Ruth Posselt, playing the solo parts. Leonard Bernstein will conduct and play the solo part in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," for piano and orchestra.

At the intermission of the musical program, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak for 10 minutes. The program will conclude with Debussy's "La Mer," three orchestral sketches: "From Dawn to Moon on the Sea," "Play of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and Sea."

All ticket holders will be invited to attend the activities of the school at six, with students performing in the symphony orchestra opera, chorus and chamber music. Those with reserved section and box seats will have an additional invitation to a special performance of Menotti's opera, "Amelia Goes to the Ball" at 4:30 in the theater-concert hall.

Tickets are on sale at the box office, Tanglewood and England Bros. in Pittsfield.

St. Louisans At Music Festival

By
MRS. WILLIAM DEE BECKER

LENOX, MASS., Aug. 7.

HOTELS and houses for miles around this New England town are filled with music lovers from all over the world, attracted by the Berkshire Festival. Many languages are heard in the natural amphitheater in the hills where the Boston Symphony plays to huge cosmopolitan audiences.

Not only the music but beautifully dressed women contributed to an auspicious opening night. Center of attention was French Ambassador Henri Bonnet and Mme. Bonnet, who lived up to her reputation for smart gowns by wearing a strapless black and silver lame dress with an enormous stole to match. In their box were the famous violinist, Albert Spalding, and Mrs. Spalding.

In the intermission, the Bonnets paid their respects to Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, who sat in a nearby box, dressed in periwinkle blue.

Mrs. James Martin Nelson is here for the series and has been joined by Mrs. Kenneth G. Carpenter, who now lives in Connecticut but has come down from her summer place in Maine. Another former St. Louisan who is enjoying the concerts is Mrs. Benjamin G. Chapman, who divides her time between Bennyfield, the Chapman summer home in East Hampton, L.I., and Arizona. Mrs. Chapman's sister-in-law, Mrs. Louise Bowen of Detroit, is spending a month as her guest at East Hampton and she, too, is here for the music. Miss Eunice Smith of Alton, long a patron of the arts, is here with a college friend from the East, and the other day we met Mrs. Rose Jonas.

The location for the festival is ideal, for it is set among green hills in the Stockbridge Bowl, which has a lake in the center. Tall old trees and beautiful estates add to its charm. The surrounding towns date from the eighteenth century.

LENOX, so say its natives, was a rival of Newport in the gay '90s, and that may well be true considering the show places with their spacious grounds and huge stables. The Carnegies, Tappans, Bullards and Vanderbilts are but a few of the well known families who spent part of each year here.

Elm Court was built by Commodore Vanderbilt and still belongs to the family. It is fascinating because of its original furnishings, grounds and greenhouses famous for espaliered fruit trees, and is a delightful place to stay.

Dr. and Mrs. M. Hayward Post held open house Friday night at their summer home in Pleasant Valley. The house has been in Mrs. Post's family for four generations and not only is lovely from the exterior but is filled with original accouterments. The party was large and delightful, with the guest list made up of their many friends who spend their summers in this part of the country.

The Posts' son, Martin, who is here for a two-week vacation, invited a group of young persons, one of whom was John Franciscus, who is on a holiday from college.

The Curtis Hotel here in Lenox has perhaps the largest number of guests for the Berkshire season, and Friday night Dr. I. D. Kelley was staying there, seeking accommodations for Mrs. Kelley and himself for a later concert series.

I am sorry to leave this delightful place, but Cape Cod, with a different sort of charm, is next on my list, and a column will be coming from there.

Main Concert At Berkshire Tomorrow

The main concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival, with the full Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Charles Munch, will begin at 8:15 p. m. tomorrow in the 6,000-seat shed at Tanglewood.

Again, as in the preliminary classical series of programs in the theater-concert hall, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, late director of the festival and conductor emeritus of the orchestra, will be honored with the playing in his memory of Mozart's Funeral Music, K 447. Also on the program will be Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D Minor and Berlioz' Symphony Fantastique.

Second Concert Saturday

The second concert of Series A of the festival, at 8:15 p. m. Saturday, will include the overture to Weber's "Oberon," Prokofieff's Symphony No. 6 and the Brahms Piano Concert No. 2 with Claudio Arrau as soloist.

The third and concluding concert in this opening series at 3 p. m. Sunday will have on the program the overture to Barber's "A School for Scandal," Copland's "Quiet City," Schubert's Symphony No. 4 in C Minor and Franck's Symphony in D Minor.

The score of the Berlioz symphony calls for the playing of church bells and usually an ordinary set of tube chimes suffices. In the Tanglewood performance there will be an innovation, for Mr. Munch has added to the percussion section of the orchestra a set of bells especially cast for him in France.

Special Memorial Concert

There will be a special highlight Friday night when all departments of the Berkshire Music Center will combine in a special memorial concert for Dr. Koussevitsky. The student chorus will sing the Bach Cantata No. 118. A chamber music group will play the Schubert "Trout" Quintet. There will be a performance of an original student work composed for the occasion.

The complete "Pique Dame" will be given Monday and Tuesday, directed by Boris Goldovsky,

Last of Tanglewood Series on Tonight

'Missa Solemnis' Will Be Conducted by Bernstein

The closing series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., begins tonight at 8:15, when Leonard Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in D major. The soloists in this performance, given in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, are Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. On Saturday night Charles Munch will conduct the orchestra in three symphonies, Beethoven's first, Honegger's fifth and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic." His program for the last festival concert, Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, consists of three works of Brahms: the Haydn Variations and the second and fourth symphonies.

The Boston Symphony will also give a concert tomorrow night at 8:30 as the principal feature of the annual "Tanglewood on Parade" program for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Bernstein will double as conductor and pianist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue"; Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be the soloist in short works by Bloch and Arbos, with Richard Burgin conducting; Eleazar de Carvalho and Mr. Munch will conduct in works by Berlioz and Debussy. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt will be the speaker. Demonstrations by advanced students in the center's various departments will be held before the concert, beginning at 6 o'clock.

In the center's last student orchestra concert at Tanglewood Saturday afternoon, the program will include "Congedo di Savonarola," by Luigi Dallapiccola, who is visiting instructor in composition in the center's 1951 faculty. Robert Parris, Walter Piston, Mr. Bernstein, Aaron Copland and Carlos Chavez will also be represented in this program of contemporary music. Works of Chausson, Stravinsky and Mendelssohn will be played in the season's last student chamber music concert Sunday morning.

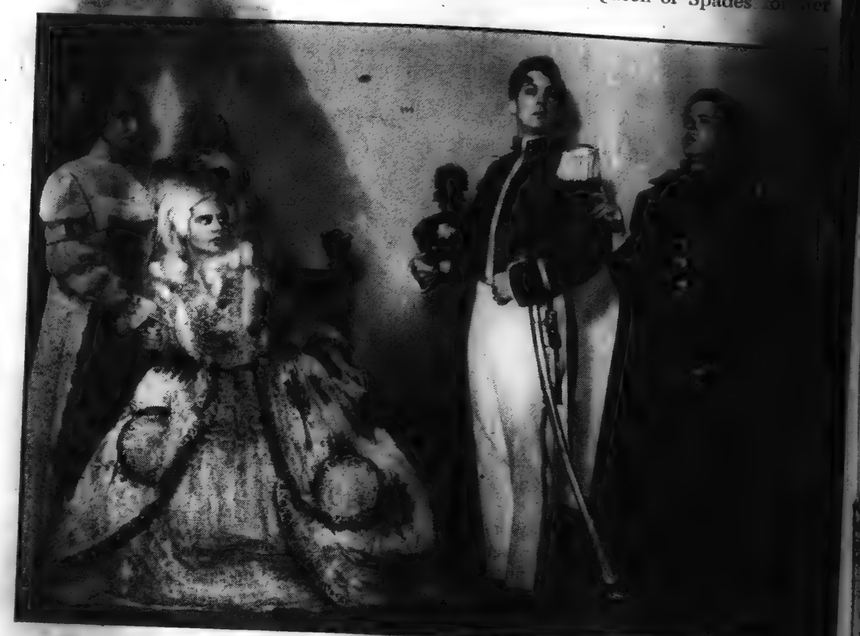
'Operation Killer'

"Have been very nervous from working. Curious that I should be both so madly inspired and yet find the work so full of difficulties," wrote Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky in 1890. He was referring to his struggles in composing his opera "The Queen of Spades" ("Pique-Dame").

But for the past month his words might well have been emblazoned over the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, as Goldovsky said in dedicating the performances to Koussevitzky's memory: "It is far short of what Koussevitzky would have accomplished, but we dedicate it to him in all humility and gratitude for everything he had done."

The opera is based on Pushkin's story, with an involved libretto by Modeste Tchaikovsky, the composer's brother. In three acts and seven scenes, "The Queen of Spades" tells of Hermann's love for Lisa, whose cronelike grandmother is known as the Queen of Spades [illegible]



Curtin, Alberts, Pease, and Lloyd: The countess told her secret

Mass., where, last week, "The Queen of Spades" was given one of its rare American performances. So great were the hazards connected with getting the opera on the boards that all of Tanglewood referred to it as "Operation Killer."

It was originally scheduled as the late Serge Koussevitzky's American opera debut. The master of Tanglewood had never conducted an opera in the land of his adoption. His death last June canceled the plans. It became an on-again off-again project at Tanglewood and was finally scheduled as a Koussevitzky memorial. The brunt of the burden was borne by Boris Goldovsky, director of the Tanglewood school's opera department, who translated, directed, and conducted it. Besides attending classes, the students assembled Tchaikovsky's opera in less than a month, and the orchestra had only a week at the score.

The greatest hazard was a technical one, for the stage crew had to cope with seven sets which alone would tax the resources of a large opera company. But prodigious luck at cards. Hermann confronts her, but she dies of fright—without revealing her secret—and then Lisa kills herself. Meanwhile, the countess' ghost reveals to Hermann the unbeatable parlay: the three, seven, and ace of spades. He has a winning streak but loses on the ace when he has another vision of the countess—whereupon, he stabs himself. David Lloyd, as Hermann, and James Pease as Tomsky, both of the New York City Opera Co., came off with first honors, while Phyllis Curtin (Lisa) and Eunice Alberts (the countess) shared the other leading role.

So certain was Tchaikovsky of its success that he called "The Queen of Spades" his masterpiece. That he stole the show at Tanglewood was self-evident, for all the reviews rhapsodized over what Virgil Thomson of The New York Herald Tribune called "its dramatic power and world musical wealth." Tanglewood, last week, could agree with Tchaikovsky: "I am full of the awareness of a successfully accomplished tremendous task."

Four Conductors on Podium Aug. 10 in 'Tanglewood'

RAIN OR SHINE, the annual benefit of Berkshire Music Center, "Tanglewood on Parade" will take place Friday. Late that afternoon, in the Theater-Concert Hall, there will be a special performance of Gian-Carlo Menotti's opera "Amelia Goes to the Ball." In the Shed, at 8 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, conducting, will present a concert. Director Munch will conduct Debussy's "The Sea," the three orchestral sketches comprising "From Dawn To Noon on the Sea," "Play of the Waves" and "Dialogue of the Sea." Between the operatic performance and the concert in the Shed there will be a six o'clock program of the Music Center. During the manifestation, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will be guest speaker.

"TANGLEWOOD ON Parade" also will offer, in the concert in The Shed, the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini," Eleazar De Carvalho, conducting; Ruth Posselt, violinist, as soloist with the orchestra in Bloch's "Nigun" and Arbis' "Tango Espgnol," Richard Burgin, conducting. Burgin is concertmaster of the Boston Symphony. Ruth Posselt, in private life, is Mrs. Burgin. Leonard Bernstein will conduct and play the solo part in George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue," for piano and orchestra. Tomorrow night, Bernstein makes his first appearance of the season, in The Shed, conducting Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, with orchestra and soloists, in memory of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, organizer of the Center and director in "Tanglewood" for many seasons. Thirty-three states and 11 countries are represented in the Center this season, the ninth session. Syracuse students include Estelle J. Kasnitz, alto, 311 Salt Springs rd. and Raymond D. In the Tanglewood performance there will be an innovation, for Mr. Munch has added to the percussion section of the orchestra a set of bells especially cast for him in France.

Special Memorial Concert

There will be a special highlight Friday night when all departments of the Berkshire Music Center will combine in a special memorial concert for Dr. Koussevitsky. The student chorus will sing the Bach Cantata No. 118. A chamber music group will play the Schubert "Trout" Quintet. There will be a performance of an original student work composed for the occasion.

The complete "Pique Dame" will be given Monday and Tuesday, directed by Boris Goldovsky.

Last of Tanglewood Series on Tonight

'Missa Solemnis' Will Be Conducted by Bernstein

The closing series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., begins tonight at 8:15, when Leonard Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in D major. The soloists in this performance, given in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, are Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass. On Saturday night Charles Munch will conduct the orchestra in three symphonies, Beethoven's first, Honegger's fifth and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic." His program for the last festival concert, Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock, consists of three works of Brahms: the Haydn Variations and the second and fourth symphonies.

The Boston Symphony will also give a concert tomorrow night at 8:30 as the principal feature of the annual "Tanglewood on Parade" program for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Bernstein will double as conductor and pianist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue"; Ruth Posselt, violinist, will be the soloist in short works by Bloch and Arbos, with Richard Burgin conducting; Eleazar de Carvalho and Mr. Munch will conduct in works by Berlioz and Debussy. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt will be the speaker. Demonstrations by advanced students in the center's various departments will be held before the concert, beginning at 6 o'clock.

In the center's last student orchestra concert at Tanglewood Saturday afternoon, the program will include "Congedo di Savonarola," by Luigi Dallapiccola, who is visiting instructor in composition in the center's 1951 faculty. Robert Parris, Walter Piston, Mr. Bernstein, Aaron Copland and Carlos Chavez will also be represented in this program of contemporary music. Works of Chausson, Stravinsky and Mendelssohn will be played in the season's last student chamber music concert Sunday morning.

MUSIC

'Operation Killer'

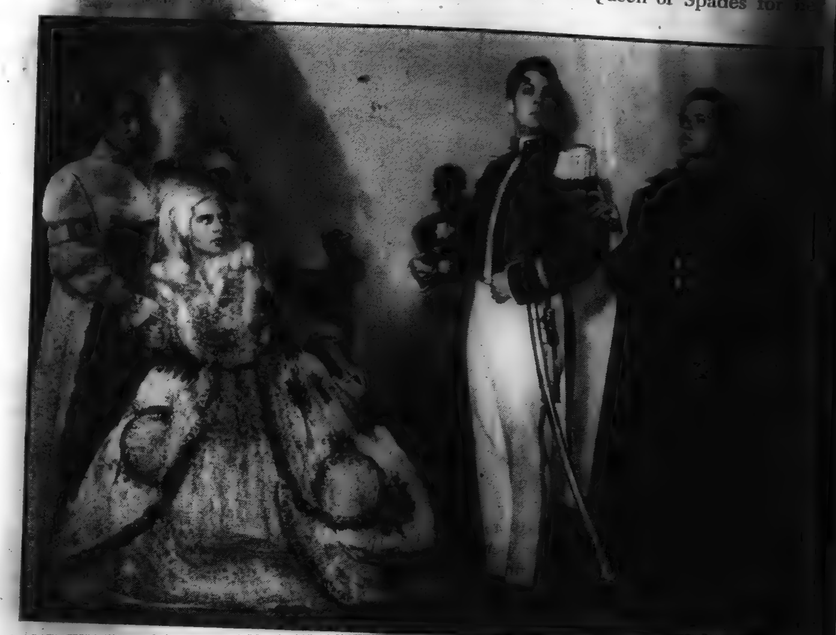
"Have been very nervous from working. Curious that I should be both so madly inspired and yet find the work so full of difficulties," wrote Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky in 1890. He was referring to his struggles in composing his opera "The Queen of Spades" ("Pique-Dame").

But for the past month his words might well have been emblazoned over the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., where, last week, "The Queen of Spades" was given one of its rare American performances. So great were the hazards connected with getting the opera on the boards that all of Tanglewood referred to it as "Operation Killer."

It was originally scheduled as the late Serge Koussevitzky's American opera debut. The master of Tanglewood had never conducted an opera in the land of his adoption. His death last June canceled the plans. It became an on-again off-again project at Tanglewood and was finally scheduled as a Koussevitzky memorial. The brunt of the burden was borne by Boris Goldovsky, director of the Tanglewood school's opera department, who translated, directed, and conducted it. Besides attending classes, the students assembled Tchaikovsky's opera in less than a month, and the orchestra had only a week at the score.

The greatest hazard was a technical one, for the stage crew had to cope with seven sets which alone would strain the resources of a large opera company. But as Goldovsky said in dedicating the performances to Koussevitzky's memory: "It is far short of what Koussevitzky would have accomplished, but we dedicate it to him in all humility and gratitude for everything he had done."

The opera is based on Pushkin's story, with an involved libretto by Modeste Tchaikovsky, the composer's brother. In three acts and seven scenes, "The Queen of Spades" tells of Hermann's love for Lisa, whose cronelike grandmother is known as the Queen of Spades for her prodigious luck at cards. Hermann confronts her, but she dies of fright—without revealing her secret—and then Lisa kills herself. Meanwhile, the countess' ghost reveals to Hermann the unbeatable parlay: the three, seven and ace of spades. He has a winning streak but loses on the ace when he has another vision of the countess—whereupon, he stabs himself. David Lloyd as Hermann and James Pease as Tomsky, both of the New York City Opera Co., came off with first honors, while Phyllis Curtin (Lisa) and Eunice Alberts (the Countess) shared the other leading role.



Curtin, Alberts, Pease, and Lloyd: The countess told her secret

So certain was Tchaikovsky of its success that he called "The Queen of Spades" his masterpiece. That he stole the show at Tanglewood was self-evident, for all the reviews rhapsodized over what Virgil Thomson of The New York Herald Tribune called "its dramatic power and untold musical wealth." Tanglewood, last week, could agree with Tchaikovsky: "I am aware of a successfully accomplished tremendous task."

MUSICAL GOOD NEIGHBORING: Mr. and Mrs. Adolf A. Berle Jr. pose with Eleazar deCarvalho, Brazilian conductor and composer, at a reception for deCarvalho held Sunday afternoon at the summer home of Mme. Serge Koussevitsky. The one-time pupil of the late musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra had just led the Boston Orchestra in a program heard by 10,000 at Tanglewood. Mr. Berle, Great Barrington summer resident, was one of the leading exponents of the South American "good neighbor" policy, ending his 14 years of service in the State Department as U.S. ambassador to Brazil in 1946 and 1947.

MUSIC FETE HONORS DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

'Missa Solemnis' Presented as Requiem at Tanglewood —8,000 Attend Program

By ROSS PARMENTER
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 9—Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was to have been the chief work to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky at this year's Berkshire festival, but because of his recent death it became a requiem mass in his honor, when it was presented at Tanglewood tonight.

The mass was conducted by Leonard Bernstein, one of Dr. Koussevitzky's protégé. Fittingly enough, it was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a chorus of 140 students of the Berkshire Music Center. To help ensure the success of the performance, Charles Munch, as a gesture to his predecessor, surrendered part of his own rehearsal time, for its preparation.

The mass was the only work of the program and it attracted an audience of 8,000. It was the largest Thursday audience of the season.

Despite the memorial nature of the occasion, the performance was not funereal. It hardly could be, considering the character of Beethoven's music. Mr. Bernstein made sure that the program was vigorous and alive.

"Kyrie," "Gloria" Exciting

Indeed, one wondered if perhaps he didn't try to make the "Kyrie," the "Gloria" and "Credo" so exciting that the audience could not restrain its applause in spite of the printed request that applause be omitted.

For one listener, the most beautiful and expressive parts of the performance were the three prevailingly quiet closing sections, "the Sanctus," "the Benedictus" and the "Agnus Dei." This, however, may have been partly due to a shift in hearing position.

Mr. Bernstein experimented by playing his four soloists in the back row of the chorus. They stood almost against the acoustical reflector and from up close they sounded rather colorless and insufficiently dominating. Following a report that they sounded better at the back, however, this reviewer moved there after the "Credo."

The report was well founded. From the rear, the voices of the soloists sounded clear, true and strong, sustaining the melodic lines in a way that upheld the whole work. Those soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, all of whom have been students at one time or another at the Berkshire Music Center.

Events Set for Tomorrow

One can assume that, could he have heard the performance, Dr. Koussevitzky would have been touched and flattered. But perhaps his heart would have been even more gladdened by the series of events that is scheduled for tomorrow—the annual mustering of talent known as "Tanglewood on Parade."

Students of the departments of the center will show off for visitors in various smaller concerts and in the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be led alternately by Eleazar de Carvalho, Richard Burgin, Mr. Bernstein and Mr. Munch.

Mr. Bernstein will double as piano soloist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" and during the intermission there will be a brief talk by Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, who collaborated with Dr. Koussevitzky last season as the narrator for "Peter and the Wolf." The event will close with the customary waltzing on the lawn, for it was one of the conductor's dearest wishes that what he helped create here should continue with its spirit unabated.

TANGLEWOOD UNITS SHOW THEIR WARES

Music Groups at the Berkshire Center Have Annual 'Parade' —Mrs. Roosevelt Speaks

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10—Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt spoke briefly tonight during the intermission of the main concert at the annual "Tanglewood on Parade." Her appearance at Tanglewood this year was marked by a casual informality, the keynote of the whole day.

She drove from Hyde Park in her car with two companions and arrived about 6:30 P. M. Soon, after her arrival, she sat under a large maple tree and ate a simple picnic supper she brought along in her basket. A few acquaintances nodded and some spoke, but for the most part, Mrs. Roosevelt was just one of the thousands of visitors.

Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony, introduced Mrs. Roosevelt to the audience. She recalled her previous visits to Tanglewood and regretted that she had known Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for so short a time.

Weather Clears Up

Berkshire weathers, for the last twenty-four hours threatening, cleared by noon, and during the whole afternoon the sun shone warmly down on a casual throng that ebbed and flowed from one musical feast to another.

Starting at 6, the crowd divided itself between opera scenes given at the Theatre Concert Hall, chamber music performed at the Little Music Hall and a student orchestra playing at t heMain Shed. And always there were the endless queues at the outdoor cafeterias. People did just what they wanted. Children from a dozen camps milled around.

In a thoroughly relaxed atmosphere, people seemed to walk from one performance to another, like a happy crowd at a picture gallery, This absence of formal restraint seemed to broaden the pleasure of the audience, blended into one vast happy sea of rhythmically-moving listeners.

The day's activities began at 4:30 P. M. with two operatic selections given by the music center students in the Theatre Concert Hall. The opening number was an excerpt from the first act of "The Marriage of Figaro" by Mozart. This was followed by an excerpt from the third act of "La Boheme" by Puccini.

The Principal Programs

'General admission to performances by the different departments began at 6 o'clock, with three simultaneous presentations. In the Chamber Music Hall, a program of works by composition students featured new pieces by F. James Brown and Arnold Freed. The principal number was Villa-Lobos' "Nonetto," for small choir and flute, oboe, clarinet, saxophone, bassoon, celesta, harp, piano and percussion, condutcted by Eleazor De Carvalho.

In the main shed a student orchestra, under the direction of four conductors, presented a varied program. Pietro Bellugi conducted Ravel's "Bother Goose." Then Russell Stanger took the baton to lead the orchestra in Strauss' "Don Juan," a tome poem after Nickolaus Lenau, Op. 20.

The second part of the program featured a composition by a faculty member of the music center, Irving Fine. This piece, "Alice in Wonderland," a Suite for Chorus and Orchestra, evoked light laughter and applause. The concert ended with the light dreamy music of Debussy's "Two Nocturnes for Orchestra."

At the same time, in the Concert Theatre Hall, the opera department, under the direction of Boris Goldovsky, presented four scenes from Italian opera. These were excerpts from thre operas by Verdi, "The Masked Ball," "Aida" and "Rigoletto." The final number was from "Cavalleria Rusticana," by Mascagni.

MUSIC FESTIVAL PERFORMANCE IS ONE OF GREATEST

Sprfld Aug 10

Adele Addison's Singing at Koussevitzky Memorial Is Satisfying

BY WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, Aug. 9 — Had the current music festival here at Tanglewood produced nothing more than the monumental performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis in D Major", it would have accomplished its mission. Under the baton of Leonard Bernstein, this performance, given tonight in memory of Serge Koussevitzky proved one of the greatest performances we have ever heard at Tanglewood. Soloists, chorus and orchestra seemed inspired, and the audience of some 8000 persons were unable to keep their emotions under control and more than once broke the request of "no applause."

Pure Effortless Tones

The soloists were Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass. There were many Springfield people in the audience and among the most interested was Mrs. Ruth Ekberg, Miss Addison's vocal teacher. She had a right to be supremely satisfied with her pupil, for Miss Addison has seldom been heard to greater advantage. From the very first "Kyrie", her voice poured forth, effortlessly, pure and unforced. Hers was the type of perfect projection, so often sought, so seldom accomplished. David Lloyd forced his fine voice unmercifully, with the resulting thickening of tone and Miss Alberts was not far behind him. Mr. Pease sang effectively.

The chorus made up of fresh youthful voices, sang with brilliant effect. It was responsive to every command and able to produce the nuances demanded by Mr. Bernstein. We have never experienced a greater musical satisfaction than the magnificent singing we heard in the "Gloria." It was dramatic, yet restrained. Mr. Bernstein's reading of this score was masterly. He emphasized the dramatic elements, yet provided ample contrasts. Particularly effective was his noble line at the beginning of the Sanctus, and the exultant Allegro which followed. The singing of the chorus was another proof of the amazing skill of Hugh Ross, who prepared it for this performance.

Bernstein's Grasp Exceptional

It would require an exceptional receptivity to grasp at one hearing the bulk of this monumental mass. What was most apparent to the audience was its spirit, its nobility and the exceptional grasp which Leonard Bernstein had of it. We feel certain that every participant in this performance was filled with an awareness of the work they were interpreting; aware also that this was a memorial to the great maestro who made Tanglewood and the Berkshire Music School what it is today.

Tanglewood Lawn Patrons Scamper for Storm Shelter

Lenox, Aug. 9—Although clouds hung low over Tanglewood tonight some 8000 music lovers arrived for the first concert of the final series of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Conductor Leonard Bernstein was concluding the first half of the program by the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra, when a typical Berkshire electric storm broke loose to add a wet note.

As the heavens opened up with a heavy downpour,' the huge crowds gathered on the spacious lawn went scampering to the shelter of the outer fringes of the vast music shed.

Within 15 minutes, the rain subsided and the concert devotees returned to their positions on the dampened green in time for the after-intermission portion of the program.

An odd fact was that but a few miles to the south, in the business district of Stockbridge, there was no rain.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 7.—The production of "Ariadne" on Naxos" of Richard Strauss at Tanglewood last night was, according to the practice established for such events, essentially a student offering of the Berkshire Music Center's Opera Department, with a few professional singers to bolster it up. These singers were not the more experienced and familiar ones that had adorned the cast of "Pique Dame" last week, and something less was to be expected in the way of security and finish. Once this factor and conservatory standards were taken into account, the production was highly creditable and the general level of singing quite respectable.

There was even something of a discovery, since Gladys Spector, who has sung only minor roles with the New York City Opera Company, handled the name-part with exceptional poise, elevation of feeling, a voice of uncommon beauty and sustaining power, and genuinely sensitive phrasing.

"Ariadne" has more than the usual reliance on precise casting of all three of its feminine leads. Jacqueline Bazinet, a Zerbinetta with unmistakable potentialities for coloratura, and Georgiana Bannister, who sang the role of the composer with clean vocalism, were good for the roles as types. But, except in a few quiet passages, Miss Bazinet's singing had no lightness of style, and Miss Bannister is not yet prepared to cope with the abrupt alternations between exuberance and rage. Mac Morgan and Raymond Smolover were satisfying both as singers and actors.

In the first half, where comedy prevails, we were unpleasantly conscious of certain tendencies observed before in the Berkshire Opera Department's handling of this genre. The clowning is taken as the most important thing, and musical phrasing gives way to syllabic emphasis.

Except for a valid interpolation of some dialogue, the production took none of the chances that give school ventures a special reason for being. It competed with the professional, and in this light the cuts and the inexperience of the singers placed it at a disadvantage. Neither the choice of the opera nor the staging reflected the sophistication that characterizes other departments of the Berkshire School. Despite intonation difficulties, the orchestra was adequate. But under Sarah Caldwell's direction the pacing was rather inflexible.

Busy Season On At Tanglewood

Berkshire Eagle 7/10/51

At least one musical event, and sometimes three, is scheduled for nearly every day of the coming week at Tanglewood, summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Wednesday evening a chamber music concert by the New Music String Quartet, through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress, will be heard.

The concert will be the first of a series of three on succeeding Wednesday evenings open to Friends of the Berkshire Music Center and by invitation to friends of Mrs. Coolidge, who has made possible a similar series each season since 1946.

Eleazar deCarvalho, Brazilian conductor will conduct the student orchestra in its second concert of the season Friday evening (July 13). Sunday morning the students will play chamber music and hold a "composers' forum" in the evening.

The two Festival concerts by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday night and Sunday afternoon, will be devoted to the music of Haydn. Saturday night's program will include the Symphonie Concertante for violin, cello, oboe and bassoon, the "London" and B major symphonies and the Piano Concerto in D major, with Seymour Lipkin, piano soloist. Gregor Piatigorsky will play the cello part in the Violoncello Concerto Sunday, when the program will include the "Drum Roll", "Clock" and "Oxford" Symphonies.

The first opera program, to be given under Boris Goldovsky next Tuesday evening, will be Mozart's "The Impresario", Stravinsky's "Mavra" and Martinu's "Comedy on the Bridge", all having their first Tanglewood performance.

The Berkshire Trio, whose chamber music performance met Wednesday evening, is one of the series of three, sponsored by the Coolidge Foundation will feature early French music. The program was chosen to celebrate the founding of Paris 2000 years ago.

Evening performances start at 8:15, afternoon at 3. Voluntary contributions to the Music Center, which constitutes membership in the Friends society, are received at the Tanglewood office. Information will be mailed on request.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10.—The large choral works given annually as part of the Berkshire Music Festival bring together in a quite gratifying way the music school at Tanglewood and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which otherwise tend to pursue rather independent courses. The highly affecting performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" in the shed last night was thus a triumph not only for Leonard Bernstein and the excellent orchestra he conducted, but for the Berkshire Music Center, which provided the membership of the large chorus trained by Hugh Ross.

Second only to Mr. Bernstein's impressive maturity as a serious and dominating conductor was the fervent and disciplined musicianship of the student chorus and the artistry of the four soloists, who included three professional students of the school's opera department and one alumna.

It was an ambitious undertaking for all concerned, and for Mr. Bernstein in particular who, at thirty-three, addressed himself to a task that is generally assumed to be within the domain of conductors who have at least attained middle age. This young conductor, elevated abruptly into a position of prominence at twenty-six, has inevitably committed indiscretions of youth and has put himself at times, through his gestures and a certain nervous showmanship, in the way of the music he has conducted. But last night there was no question of his earnestness, his capacity to encompass the architecture of a massive, challenging score and his knowledge and loving care with regard to detail. For all the participants there was the additional incentive that the event was in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, and justice was done all around to this aim.

Though Mr. Ross' contribution to the evening's musical effectiveness and brilliance is not to be underestimated, it was apparent that Mr. Bernstein has a very compelling way with massed choral forces.

In addition, he delineated the separate contents of the various sections of the mass with keen perception, and the tricky dovetailing from one to another was excellently accomplished. The conductor judiciously placed the soloists at the back of the platform, above the chorus, for from this position sound is best projected through the shed. Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, of them young performers, distinguished themselves with expressive and knowing handling of the difficult vocal parts. There was a minor blemish in Richard Burgin's intonation during the wonderful solo violin obbligato in the "Benedictus." But at the final stretch of a fairly relentless summer season of orchestral activity, the concertmaster may be pardoned for falling from grace last night.

The printed program announced another festival for next year with Charles Munch again in charge. At this point of uncertainty following the death of the dedicated founder and director of the Berkshire Music Center, it was also good to see from this announcement that the school will continue and have a tenth anniversary season. No directorship announced. The fine showing of the [illegible] chorus last night renders it more than ever imperative that so worthy a project be carried on.

Music Center Student Awards Due Saturday

Aug 8

The Berkshire County Eagle

TANGLEWOOD.—Three important annual awards will be made to students of the Berkshire Music Center at the symphonic orchestra concert Saturday afternoon at 3 in the shed.

The Heifetz award will be presented to the violin student who has shown the most co-operative attitude, talent and future promise during the season.

The Piatigorsky award will be granted to the student of the cello who has best fulfilled, in the opinion of the faculty, the same requirements.

The Wechsler commission will be given a former Tanglewood student of composition for a choral or orchestral work.

Named for the original donors Jascha Heifetz, Gregor Piatigorsky and Samuel Wechsler, the prizes are announced at the end of each Tanglewood season after a conference of the school faculty. Mr. Wechsler, a New York broker whose avocation is music, enrolled as a student at the school in the 1950 season. He has been invited to attend Saturday.

Second only to Mr. Bernstein's impressive maturity as a serious and dominating conductor was the fervent and disciplined musicianship of the student chorus and the artistry of the four soloists, who included three professional students of the school's opera department and one alumna.

It was an ambitious undertaking for all concerned, and for Mr. Bernstein in particular who, at thirty-three, addressed himself to a task that is generally assumed to be within the domain of conductors who have at least attained middle age. This young conductor, elevated abruptly into a position of prominence at twenty-six, has inevitably committed indiscretions of youth and has put himself at times, through his gestures and a certain nervous showmanship, in the way of the music he has conducted. But last night there was no question of his earnestness, his capacity to encompass the architecture of a massive, challenging score and his knowledge and loving care with regard to detail. For all the participants there was the additional incentive that the event was in memory of Serge Koussevitsky, and justice was done all around to this aim.

Though Mr. Ross' contribution to the evening's musical effectiveness and brilliance is not to be underestimated, it was apparent that Mr. Bernstein has a very compelling way with massed choral forces.

In addition, he delineated the separate contents of the various sections of the mass with keen perception, and the tricky dovetailing from one to another was excellently accomplished. The conductor judiciously placed the soloists at the back of the platform, above the chorus, for from this position sound is best projected through the shed. Adele Addison, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, of them young performers distinguished themselves with expressive and knowing handling of the difficult vocal parts. There was a minor blemish in Richard Burgin's intonation during the wonderful solo violin obbligato in the "Benedictus." But at the final stretch of a fairly relentless summer season of orchestral activity the concertmaster may be pardoned for falling from grace last night.

The printed program announced another festival for next year with Charles Munch again in charge. At this point of uncertainty following the death of the dedicated founder and director of the Berkshire Music [illegible] was also good to see [illegible] announcement that the [illegible] will continue and have a [illegible] versary season. No [illegible] anounced. The fine showing [illegible] chorus last night suggests that [illegible] than ever imperative that [illegible] project be carried on.

Music Center Student Awards Due Saturday

TANGLEWOOD — Three important annual awards will be made to students of the Berkshire Music Center at the symphonic orchestra concert Saturday afternoon at 3 in the shed.

The Heifetz award will be presented to the violin student who has shown the most co-operative attitude, talent and future promise during the season.

The Piatigorsky award will be granted to the student of the cello who has best fulfilled, in the opinion of the faculty, the same requirements.

The Wechsler composition award will be given a former Tanglewood student of composition for a choral or orchestral work.

Named for the original donors Jascha Heifetz, Gregor Piatigorsky and Samuel Wechsler, the prizes are announced at the end of each Tanglewood session after a conference of the school faculty. Mr. Wechsler, a New York broker whose avocation is music, enrolled as a student at the school in the 1950 season. He has been invited to attend Saturday.

DeCarvalho, Bolet Score Impressively

AUG 6 1951

Special to The Hartford Times

LENOX, MASS. — A colorful program and Eleazar DeCarvalho, a colorful young conductor, ably entertained Sunday afternoon's big, bright audience at Tanglewood with a notable assist from Jorge Bolet, a rising Cuban pianist who put heart, soul and all 88 keys to excellent use in Prokofieff's Second Piano Concerto.

Besides the Prokofieff, the program included Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration," and Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," as built up into a rousing piece of bravura by Maurice Ravel.

MR. DE CARVALHO is a young man with a great deal of bounce, conductorial energy and know-how (he ran through most of the program without a score), and he put a corresponding amount of energy and brilliance into a program that without it would have been quite on the dull side.

The Weber overture, for example, is a bright winning little trifle and little more, but Mr. De Caravlho put so much vigor and pulse into that you could almost imagine that it was worth all the trouble.

"Death and Transfiguration," on the other hand, has energy aplenty in its pretentious design, and the almost impossible trick is to make it mean something. This reviewer has always been able to spot at least two places where Strauss died and two more where he was transfigured in the course of the piece, and the young Brazilian conductor brought each of these out in full force.

BUT BEYOND that he was unable to go, and if he revealed much that is inherently majestic in the work, he was also forced to simply play through much that is dreary.

The Prokofieff, however, was quite a different matter. This is a wild, rugged, virile work, full of clashing discords, overflowing with verve and excitement.

WITH MR. BOLET giving a warm, quivering account of himself at the keyboard, both he and the orchestra carried the broad sweep of the music right to the heart of the audience where it belonged, and the audiences responded with a standing ovation that must have lasted a full five minutes. It was a truly exciting bit of music making.

The afternoon closed with the program's other big, flashing work, the often lovely, always impressive "Pictures at an Exhibition" with its thundering climax in the soul-stirring "Great Gate at Kiev."

Here all the Boston Symphony's firepower, all its tonal richness and overpowering virtuosity were superbly unleashed by Mr. DeCarvalho. A rare technician is this young fellow, and he sent the unrelentingly black-clad audience home with warmer hearts and tingling toes.

IT REMAINS to be seen, I suppose, just how much poetry Mr. DeCarvalho can infuse into his technical virtuosity, but he proved himself a crowd pleaser Sunday, and that is a big step along the way.—E. C.

Bartok Composition

One of the most important performances so far in the 1951 Tanglewood festival was the Bartok "Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta" played Saturday night. It is a fascinating composition but ineptly placed between Handel's suite from the "Water Music" and Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe second suite. This made for an unusually long pre-intermission and the Bartok music in itself carried enough weight to have been heard in place of a symphony.

This is music of our time, entirely debt-free from the extravagances of romanticism and its aftermath, yet sharing nothing of the vacuity and pretense of modernism. It does not use dissonance to substitute for ideas. Its play of timbres exfoliates from the abundance of its thematic life. Its rhythmic power as well as the atmospheric suggestion of the two slow movements attested the new virtuosity of the Boston Orchestra under Munch's baton. As an interpreter he demonstrated that he can be as realistic as he is urbane.

The latter quality informed the Saint-Saëns C minor Symphony. He gave it an uncommonly sweet adagio and the Symphony as a whole had larger dimensions than is usually the case. This was a matter of design rather than sonority for E. Power Biggs who presided at the organ console, instead of playing an obbligato integrated his part symphonically and with excellent, if subdued, effect.

The Ravel suite was of special interest due to the reinforcement of the Festival Chorus singing wordlessly to cap the instrumental climaxes of this brilliant and pagan poem. Hugh Ross, who trained the chorus, was called upon to take a deserved bow.

The program opened with the Hamilton Harty arrangement of the Handel Suite, happily done with the deftness and clarity that distinguishes Munch's treatment of the classics.—C. E. L.

Boston Symphony To Open Concert Series July 26

Following the series of Berkshire Festival programs in the theatre-concert hall at Tanglewood this weekend, Charles Munch will open series A of the nine concerts by the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday evening, July 26, in the music shed. Meantime performances will be given daily by students at the Berkshire Music Center for members of its Friends' Society.

This Saturday evening, July 21, Mr. Munch will conduct members of the Boston Orchestra in Mozart's "Haffner" Symphony, the Adagio and Fugue for Strings and Symphony in E-flat, while Hugh Ross will take the baton for the "Missa Brevis" with the Festival chorus and Gladys Spector, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor; and James Pease, bass. Sunday afternoon Mr. Munch will conclude the Mozart series with the Divertimento for Strings and Two Horns, the "Prague" Symphony and the Violin Concerto in A major, with William Kroll as soloist.

The concert in the shed next Thursday will open with Mozart's Funeral Music, in memory of the late Serge Koussevitzky, to be followed by Schumann's Fourth Symphony and the Fantastic Symphony by Berlioz. For the latter Mr. Munch commissioned a special set of bells to be cast in France, instead of using the tubular chimes that ordinarily represent church bells. The second program in the shed Saturday evening will include Weber's Overture in "Oberon", Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau, soloist. Series A will close Sunday afternoon with Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal", Aaron Copland's "Quiet City", Schubert's Fourth Symphony and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

This Friday evening, July 20, Leonard Bernstein, conductor, who heads the school's orchestra department, will conduct the second half of the concert by the student's orchestra and students of conducting will occupy the podium for the first half. Students of chamber music will present programs each Sunday morning at 10:30 and E. Power Biggs, Boston Orchestra organist, will give a recital every Saturday at 3. There will be a composers' forum Sunday evening at 8:15 and Friday afternoon, July 27, at 4:30.

Chamber Music Series Ended By Moyse Trio

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

In the third and final concert of the chamber music series presented at the Berkshire Music Center through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge foundation in the Library of Congress, the artists were Marcel Moyse, flute; Blanche Honegger-Moyse, violin and viola; and Louis Moyse, piano and flute. They played a program of the classics for the first half and after intermission turned to contemporary music.

Marcel Moyse, the elder, eminent composer of well-known flute instruction methods, was faithful to his chosen instrument during the whole evening. Madame Honegger-Moyse and her husband, Louis Moyse, interchanged violin and viola on the one hand, and flute and piano on the other, so that every conceivable combination of ensembles was played. The viola and flute have an especial affinity, it proved, and in combinations where they were used the unity of tone quality was remarkably fine.

After trios of Bach and Haydn and a flute duo of Handel, they arrived at music of this day, by Andre Thiriet, Jacques Ibert, Arthur Honegger, Marcel Gennaro, the elder Moyse himself, and, to close, a trio-sonata by Bohuslav Martinu. It was a coincidence that three of these composers were in successive years on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center: Martinu, Honegger, and Ibert.

In the main the music was peaceful and agreeable but only in rare instances was it stimulating. In the Moyse serenade for two flutes and viola there was the most action of the evening; in the remainder there was mainly a bucolic, hazy, innocuous mood in which the competence of the performers blended with the character of the music.

The main interest of the program was its value to the young people of the Center school who constituted such a large share of the audience which filled the theatre-concert hall. In this respect the sponsors cannot be thanked enough for the series which has brought such unusual music for the pleasure and edification of the students as well as for all those others privileged to attend.

Tanglewood Symphony Program

Since its beginning in the mid-1930's, the old estate in Lenox, Mass., which is now the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has developed into a seasonal attraction for many Delaware vacationers who love symphonic music; last year the Tanglewood concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra attracted more than 125,000 persons from all over the country.

The fourteenth season of the Berkshire Festival's nine major concerts in Tanglewood's Music Shed opens this Thursday with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Charles Munch, its music director. For the next three weeks, the Festival will continue, with concerts Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 and Sunday afternoons at 3:00 o'clock. Mr. Munch will conduct seven of these concerts; Eleazar de Carvalho will conduct on Sunday, August 5; and on Thursday, August 9, Leonard Bernstein will conduct the Orchestra, with chorus and soloists, in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis, in honor of Serge Koussevitzky, late conductor-emeritus of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who was instrumental in making Tanglewood a first-rate musical center each summer.

Mr. Munch's program for this week are varied and include works by Europeans and Americans, by old masters and by contemporaries. Thursday's program will begin with a performance of Mozart's Funeral Music, K. 477, in memory of Dr. Koussevitsky; and Schumann's Fourth Symphony and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony will complete the opening concert. For this performance of the Berlioz work, the percussion section of the Orchestra will be using a set of bells specially cast for Mr. Munch in France; the score of the work calls for bells representing those of a church, but it is usually ordinary tubular chimes that are used, instead of real bells.

Saturday's program opens with Weber's Overture to Oberon; continues with the first Tanglewood performance of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony; and concludes with Brahms' Second Piano Concerto; the South American pianist, Claudio Arrau, will be soloist. Sunday afternoon's concert (July 29) will present Samuel Barber's Overture, The School for Scandal; Aaron Copland's The Quiet City; Franz Schubert's Fourth Symphony; and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor.

Tanglewood is also the campus of a unique school for young musicians, the Berkshire Music Center, which is in its ninth season this summer. Concerts and recitals by students at the Center are attended by upwards of 50,000 persons during the six-weeks session, all of whom become members of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center through their voluntary contributions to the support of the school.

Special Concert At Tanglewood

Sprfld Aug 5

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt to Speak Tonight

Tanglewood, Lenox—Today, the Berkshire Music Center will benefit from proceeds of "Tanglewood on Parade," the annual special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and those who purchase tickets to this concert will be able to attend activities of the center's student musical groups.

The student symphony orchestra will perform in the shed, at about 6 p. m., in a concert of four works: Strauss' "Don Juan;" Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite;" Debussy's "Two Nocturnes;" and Irving Fine's "Alice in Wonderland." Student conductors will lead all works in this performance.

The student chamber music groups also will perform at 6 o'clock, and Schubert's Trio in B flat and Beethoven's Serenade will be included in the program. Two works by students in composition at Tanglewood, Noel Farrand's "Adagio for Violin and Piano" and Arnold Freed's "Sonata for Piano," also will be played.

Also at about six, the opera department will stage scenes from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Puccini's "La Boheme," Verdi's "Aida" and "The Masked Ball." These scenes will be in addition to an extra performance of Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball," at 4.30 p. m., for holders of box seats and seats in the reserved sections.

During the supper hour, at about 7 p. m., the choral department will sing on the porch of the main house at Tanglewood. Their program will consist of Billings' "Modern Music No. 2;" Irving Fine's "Four Madrigals;" English's "Promised Land;" Starrer's "Five Proverbs of Love;" and Roy Harris' "Cindy."

The main event of the evening will be the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, music director, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho, and Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the orchestra. Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt will speak briefly before Mr. Munch's performance of "La Mer" by Debussy. Mr. Bernstein will play and conduct Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue;" Mr. Carvalho will conduct Berlioz' Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini;" and will be soloist: Nigun for Violin and Orchestra, by Bloch, and Arbos' Tango Espagnol, also for violin and orchestra.

THE BOSTON HERALD

MUSIC

By RUDOLPH ELIE

TANGLEWOOD, Aug. 9—"It was written from the heart, may it go to the heart," wrote Beethoven of his Missa Solemnis. Given in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, it went to the hearts of about 800 people who turned out for this memorable event of the Berkshire Festival tonight.

The mounmental choral work, equalled in sustained level of insipration only by Bach's B Minor Mass, was accompanied — as is often the case in the Berkshires —by a mounmental thunder storm—all around. Far from destroying the effect, the storm lent additional grandeur ot Beethoven's great work which, although deeply religious in character, is not without its elements of melodrama.

Indeed, in Mr. Bernstein's violently emotional approach, inspired by the sentiment of the occasion, it was an exceedingly intense reading of the score, emphasizing Beethoven's own demands for violent dynamic contrasts.

FESTIVAL CHORUS

Given with an intermission after the Gloria, the Mass was performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with the large and surprisingly flexible Festival chorus prepared for the occasion by Hugh Ross. Soloist were Adele Addision, Soprano; Eunice Alberts, Contralto; David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass.

The soloists, all familar to Boston Symphony audiences, and all notable young singers, were given the widest latitude by Mr. Bernstein. In their recent appearances with the orchestra they have been somewhat restrained by Mr. Munch, who generally holds both soloists and choral group down. Given their heads, as they were, soloists and chorus produced massive sounds. If, in the chorus, this occasionally obscured the voice leading in such fugal passages as the closing moments of the Gloria, it well became the immense expanses of the Shed and certainly was in line with Mr. Bernstein's highly charged conception. With the soloists it provided an opportunity for a display of the voice, and they made the most of it. Having often appeared in this same combination, they were especially grateful to hear in quartet, being well balanced both as to vocal quality and style.

OFTEN OVERSHADOWED

The orchestra came out less well in this semi-open-air situation as the tone, the special nuance of coloring and shading, slips out the sides of the Shed. It played with marvelous efficiency last night as always, but it was often overshadowed by the tonal masses of the chorus.

Although requested not to applaud, the audience of which Mrs. Koussevitzky was a member, often broke into spontaneous applause, and would have given conductor, soloists and chorus an ovation if Mr Bernstein had not stalked solemnly off the stage at the end.

Tomorrow (Friday), Tanglewood again offers its special benefit affairs known as "Tanglewood on Parade," an event offering demonstrations of the music center in operation, a lawn party, a concert with Eleazar de Carvalho, Richard Burgin, Leonard Bernstein and Charles Munch conducting by turn, and waltzing on the lawn. Eleanor Roosevelt is to be the guest speaker.

Berkshire Music Center

The Berkshire Music Center announces three concerts of chamber music through the generosity of the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation in the Library of Congress. The New Music String Quartet will open the series the evening of July 11, to be followed on succeeding Wednesday evenings at 8:15 by the Berkshire Trio on July 18 and the Trio Moyse July 25.

The New Quartet, whose members are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violin; Claus Adam, violincello; and Walter Trampler, a former Tanglewood student, will play quartets in F minor by Hindemith, E minor by Verdi and C mapor by Beethoven.

The Berkshire Trio, composed of Georges Laurent, flute; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba, both members of the Boston orchestra and the Music Center faculty; and Sylvia Marlow, harpsichord, will include early French music. They will play the Sonata in G (Antonio Lotti); Sonata in F (Benedetto Marcello); Sonata in C (Haendel); Sonata a trois (J. M. Leclair); Les Fastes de la grande et ancienne Menestrandise (Couperin) and Troisieme Concert (M.P. Rameau).

The Noyse Trio, whose players are Marcel Moyse, flute; his son, Louis, piano and flute; and his daughter-in-law, Blanche Honegger-Moyse, violin and viola, have selected Trio-Sonate en sol majeur (Bach); Duo pour 2 flutes (Haendel); Trio en ut (Haydn-Moyse); Husique en trio (Andre Thirlet); Trois Interludes (Ibert); Trois Petites Pieces en trio (Arthur Honegger); La Chanson pour 2 flutes et violon (Marcel Gennaro); Serenade pour 2 flutes et viola (Louise Moyse) and Trio-Sonate (Martinu).

The concerts will be open to students, friends of the Berkshire Music Center and the interested public, as have other chamber music programs given through the generosity of Mrs. Coolidge and the Foundation each summer since 1946.

'Tanglewood On Parade' Is Attended by 10,000

Music Center Events Include Opera, Symphony, Violin, Piano Soloists and Talk by Mrs. Roosevelt

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, Aug. 10—"Tanglewood on Parade," the showcase of the Berkshire Music Center, drew an estimated 10,000 persons to look and listen this afternoon and evening. For listening, there was the very beautiful tribute to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, given by Mrs. Roosevelt during the evening program. In the afternoon one could hear the student orchestra, chamber music group or scenes from opera. The weather was ideal and Tanglewood has never seemed more beautiful, nor the surrounding scenery more glorious.

Costume Innovation

It seemed to us that there were crowds listening to everything offered. The student orchestra and chamber music groups gave most interesting programs. The chorus sang nicely, and in the opera shed one heard scenes from such operas as "The Masked Ball," "Aida," "Rigoletto" and "Cavaleria Rusticana," and entire scenes from "The Marriage of Figaro" and "La Boheme."

One saw also an innovation which, in the long run, may make it possible for small opera companies, or large, for that matter, to function without undue strain on their costume and scenic departments. The costumes used were some which had been devised for the University of Illinois. They are made in free style and fit practically any figure. They can be slightly altered to fit any style period.

These costumes were worn against scenic background of screens, If one has a lively imagination and knows well the story of the opera one is hearing, it is possible that mere screens as scenery may suffice, but it seems doubtful that the custom will catch on. As for the costumes, they should prove of considerable worth to a permanent company building up a wardrobe.

During the opera scenes we had the opportunity to hear the Springfield mezzo-soprano, Sarah Hoff as Mama Lucia in "Cavaleria Rusticana" and as Marcellina in "The marriage of Figaro." Her characterizations were effective.

Young Conductors

The concert by the orchestra of Department 1 was very fine. It included Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite conducted by Piero Bellugi; "The Don Juan" tone poem by Strauss, conducted by Russell Stranger; Irving Fine's "Alice in Wonderland," conducted by Robert Mandell and two nocturnes, "Clouds," and "Festivals" by Debussy, conducted by Lorin Maazel. The value of the Berkshire Music Center to young musicians was never more clearly defined than today. Where else in this country could they find opportunities equal to those here?

The concert this evening, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened with a brilliant reading of the overture "Benvenuto Cellini" by Berlioz, conducted by Eleazar De Carvalho. This fiery work was the sort which this young South American conductor seems most happy interpreting. Ruth Posselt, violinist, gave a deeply moving performance of Bloch's "Nigun" and a dazzling reading of a "Tango Espagnol" by Arbos. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Miss Posselt's husband, directed.

Mr. Munch directed the performance of "La Mer" by Debussy. It was a careful, even cautious reading. The tone of the orchestra lacked luster and its colors were dull. Mr. Munch also introduced Mrs. Roosevelt.

More Bernstein

Leonard Bernstein, who provided such a towering reading of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" last night, returned tonight as conductor soloist in Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue, for piano and orchestra." The result was more Bernstein than Gershwin, but it was a brilliant performance and, for many in the audience, the highlight of "Tanglewood on parade."

'Missa Solemnis' Tops Great Music Week at Tanglewood

Adele Addison Sings in Memorial to Koussevitzky; Strauss' 'Ariadne' Given Excellent Performance by Opera Group

By VICTOR PRAHL

No more beautiful or fitting memorial could have been given Dr. Serge Koussevitzky than the impressive performance of the monumental "Missa Solemnis," by Beethoven, given under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky's protegee, Leonard Bernstein, last Thursday at Tanglewood.

One of the most profound manifestations of deep religious feeling ever expressed in music, Beethoven himself felt it to be his greatest and most successful work. Profoundly moving was the sustained beauty of the Kyrie, Sanctus, and the ethereal Benedictus. In the more intense Agnus Dei and Credo one began to hear more directly the real voice of the master, powerful, turbulent, gripping, and at times almost theatrical. Commensurate with its colossal content is the musical and technical difficulty of the score. Hugh Ross's well trained chorus and the dependable quartet of musician-singers, Adele Addison, soprano, Eunice Alberts; contralto, David Lloyd, tenor, and James Pease, bass, all had the music well in hand and under the secure direction of Mr. Bernstein it was an outstanding performance. There are no solos as such but throughout the work the solo quartet alternates with the chorus. Adele Addison of Springfield, making her one solo appearance at Tanglewood this summer, was in excellent voice and sustained the difficult high soprano line with her accustomed artistry.

Strauss' "Ariadne" Presented

"Ariadne auf Naxos" by Richard Strauss was the second major production by the opera department of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, given last Monday and Tuesday nights. It provided another delightful evening in the theatre. In matters of production, tasteful decor and colorful costumes it upheld the high standards set by previous presentations and introduced several young singers who are undoubtedly destined for sucessful operatic careers.

Consisting of but a prologue and one act, "Adriadne" is usually given with another short work but for this production Eugene Haun, a student at the school wrote an entr'acte from material suggested in the prologue and modeled it after a scene from Moliere's "Bourgeois Gentilhomme." The spoken dialogue was a pleasant contrast, good entertainment, and the additional act made a full evening. The hero of this play, the amiable, whimsicel, "nouveau riche" Monsieur Jourdain, did not have a bad idea when he decided to have the actors and clowns he had engaged to entertain his guests, run their acts off simultaneously. If some of the stately operas on classical themes by Gluck could be presented in this manner they would be much more acceptable. Very probably this is what the librettist, Hugo von Hoffmannsthal, as well as Mr. Haun, had in mind.

Singers Do Well

It is typical Strauss score full of descriptive bombast but as the opera progresses the composer releases a wealth of luscious melodies in his best vein. Gladys Spector sustained the title role with dignity, emitting a beauty and breadth of tone that was inpressive. In remaining vocally fresh to the very end of this taxing role she demonstrated a resistance that was professional. Raymond Smolover in his Greek-God costume was a handsome Bacchus and his full resonant tenor voice gave a big lift to the final scene; Georgiana Bannister with her sympathetic soprano negotiated well the high tessitura of the music master and Jacqueline Bazinet, the Zerninetta, was an excellent comedian, singing the famous coloratura with brilliant virtuosity. In fact all of the roles in the large cast were well prepared and delivered convincingly. When the music lay for the middle voice and the orchestra permitted, the words came through clearly but not much was understood in the sung portions. This would probably have been just as true in German. Sarah Caldwell, who conducted, held her forces together admirably and added another achievement to the credit of the opera department.

It was the first time this writer had heard "Ariadne" and it gave him genuine pleasure. In this country we know Strauss mainly through "Rosenkavalier" and "Salome," so we are grateful to Mr. Goldovsky and Miss Caldwell for the opportunity of hearing this lesser known work. It is unfortunate that we do not hear more of this composer's operas. Composers like Wagner and Puccini had a pronounced personal idiom and often repeated themselves, but this privilege seems to be denied Strauss. Of course he can be long-winded and banal on occasion but we maintain that even his second best is worth a hearing. We recall with pleasure a performance of "Arabella" heard at Monte Carlo, sung in French, and a fine "Woman Without a Shadow" done at Salzburg. In our estimation, both of these works merit a hearing over here.

Eleazar de Carvalho made his annual appearance as conductor of the Boston Symphony at Tanglewood Sunday afternoon, reaffirming the fine impression he made in previous concerts. His conducting has taken on a maturity and carries an authority that inspires confidence. We regretted that the symphony by Guarnieri, originally programmed, was not performed, for Mr. de Carvalho has a special gift for contemporary works of this kind, but it seems the orchestra parts did not arrive in time. However he gave life and brightness of Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" and his realization of Strauss' great tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," was magnificent. His tempi were slower than that of most conductors but it was a consistent conception. His conducting of Ravel's orchestration of Moussorgsky's piano pieces, "Pictures at an Exhibition" were imaginative, colorful, and vitally dynamic.

In Jorge Bolet this concert introduced a major talent among contemporary pianists. He gave to Prokofieff's piano concerto in G minor a dashing virtuosity, poetry, and a perfectly controlled pianism distinguished by a beautiful tone and a transcendent technical equipment. We shall look forward to hearing this greatly gifted pianist again.

Mrs. Roosevelt Speaks At Tanglewood Concert

Special to the Herald Tribune

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 10—Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt was the guest speaker at "Tanglewood on Parade" here Friday evening, the event that annually precedes the last two concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival.

Various departments of the Berkshire Music School, which benefits from the evening's receipts, held simultaneous concerts at the beginning of the program. The climax was a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, Eleazor de Carvhalo, Leonard Bernstein and Richard Burgin.

Mr. Bernstein conducted George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" from the piano, and Ruth Posselt, violinist, was soloist in short works by Bloch and Arbos. The program included music by Berlioz and Debussy.

Mrs. Roosevelt, in a brief talk, paid tribute to the late Serge Koussevitzky. She spoke of her contact with him last year when she was the reciter of Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" at "Tanglewood on Parade," under his direction. She said his interest in the school then impressed her deeply.

Irving Fine, a faculty member of the music center, was represented at two concerts earlier in the evening by "Alice in Wonderland," for chorus and orchestra, and madrigals for unaccompanied chorus. Works by two students, Fi James Brown and Arnold Freed, and an alumnus, Robert Starer, also were given. The attendance was estimated at about 10,000.

POPULAR PROGRAM TO BE PRESENTED AT LENOX TONIGHT

The Berkshire Music center will benefit from proceeds of "Tanglewood on Parade" at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., tonight, this being the annual special concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Those who purchase tickets to this concert will be able to attend activities of the center's student musical groups.

The student symphony orchestra will perform in the shed at about 6 p. m., in a concert of four works: Strauss' "Don Juan," Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite," Debussy's "Two Nocturnes" and Irving Fine's "Alice in Wonderland." Student conductors will lead all works in this performance.

The student chamber music groups also will perform at 6 o'clock and Schubert's "Trio in B Flat" and Beethoven's "Serenade" will be included in the program. Two works by students in composition at Tanglewood, Noel Farrand's "Adagio for Violin and Piano" and Arnold Freed's "Sonata for Piano," also will be played.

Also at about 6 o'clock the opera department will stage scenes from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Puccini's "La Boheme," Verdi's "Aida" and "The Masked Ball." The scenes will be in addition to an extra performance of Menotti's "Amelia Goes to the Ball" at 4:30 p. m., for holders of box seats and seats in the reserved sections.

During the supper hour, at about 7 o'clock, the choral department will sing on th porch of the main house at Tanglewood. The program will consist of Billings' "Modern Music No. 2," Irving Fine's "Four Madrigals," English's "Promised Land," Starrer's "Five Proverbs of Love" and Roy Harris' "Cindy."

The main event of the evening will be the Boston Symphony orchestra.

BERKSHIRE AWARDS MADE

Two Violinists, Two 'Cellists and Young Composer Honored

Five young musicians yesterday received special grants from the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., at a student orchestra concert.

Two violinists, both of Boston—Jeanne Sandbank and Ma Si Hon—are recipients of the Jascha Heifetz Award. Two 'cellists—Marti Ruth Knauer of Indianapolis and Robert Sayre of Cleveland—received the Gregor Piatigorsky Award.

The Samuel Wechsler Commission, presented to a former student of composition at the Berkshire Music Center for a short choral or chamber work, has gone to Harold Shapero of Newton Center, Mass.

14,800 at Tanglewood Set Record, Cause Traffic Jam

Many Music Lovers Arrive After Intermission Due to Congestion On Highways; Parking Areas Filled

Lenox, Aug. 11—Officials at Tanglewood were "pretty certain" tonight that the estimated 14,800 attendance was a record, eclipsing by a few hundred the more than 14,000 during one of the 1947 shed concerts and precipitating bumper-to-bumper traffic on several Berkshire highways.

Many Arrive Late

There were reports from concert-goers that caught in the traffic, they were unable to reach their seats or the lawn outside the shed, until intermission. People were even arriving after the second half had begun.

Berkshire highways had been busy all day, police in the adjacent towns reported, but tonight the volume increased as Tanglewood time approached.

Lenox bore the full brunt of the outpouring. Patrolman Edward Girardey reported an even dozen extra men were on duty to keep the traffic moving. He reported a great deal of the traffic was headed for Pittsfield and the New York routes.

Traffic in Stockbridge Heavy

In Stockbridge Patrolman William Obanheim said he had seen cars from nearly every state in the union, and as he spoke tonight the first cars were beginning to pour through town after the concert, which ended about 10.30.

Interlaken and some of the other Berkshire towns were busy, too, and in Great Barrington police felt the flow of Tanglewood traffic between one half and three quarters after closing, it requiring that time to make the 12 or 14 miles from Lenox.

Pittsfield radio stations broadcast pleas for people to open their homes to tourists who, not realizing the strain on facilities of Tanglewod-goers, were without places to remain overnight.

Parking Areas Jammed

Tanglewod officials said that the acres of parking lots were "jammed beyond capacity," and they estimated it would require nearly two hours for all cars to clear the area. Ordinarily, about 40 minutes is required for an average audience of 8000.

There were about 6040 in the shed for the concert, which meant that more than 8000 were out on the lawn, enjoying the cool air and the dark summer moon overhead.

Honegger's Symphony No. 5 Heard for First Time

By VICTOR PRAHL

Lenox, Aug. 11—Arthur Honegger's Symphony No. 5 was heard at Tanglewood for the first time tonight in the concert given by the Boston Symphony under Charles Munch. Completed only last December, it has already been introduced in Boston and New York by Mr. Munch. It was written for the Koussevitzky Music Foundation and is dedicated to the memory of Natalia Koussevitzky, and Dr. Koussevitzky had looked forward to conducting this first performance here at Tanglewood.

Familiar Idiom

It is a fairly short work in three movements stated in the idiom made familiar by the composer's previous works. The first movement is introduced by the composer's previous works. The first movement is introduced impressively by the full orchestra followed by ingratiating themes played by the clarinets and English horn. The allegretto has some unusual effects in instrumentation, such as the light staccato passages between the clarinet and first violins and the lyrical portions for combined woodwinds and muted brass. The last movement is dynamic but stark and the prevailing mood throughout the work is one of tragedy. Charles Munch has made this score his own, he conducted from memory, and made the music sound as if it really meant something to him.

Meticulous Precision

The orchestra played with meticulous precision, terrific drive and altogether it was an exciting performance.

We are told that the Beethoven "First" that preceded it was an equally fine performance. We were prevented from hearing it by the worst traffic jam of the season, and trying to mill through the crowd in the auditorium at intermission was also slow moving. At intermission there was an audience of 14,000, by far the largest of the season, and cars were still pouring in. The combination of a perfect evening and Tchaikowsky's "Pathetique" may have been part of the big attraction.

Spfld Aug 12

This coming Sunday will witness the close of another successful season at Tanglewood. To us, the music this year has seemed happier and more beautiful than usual. Programs have included fewer selections which, filled with excitement, leave the audience exhausted. We have enjoyed the quieter works.

But one thing we missed. All too many of the old familiar faces, which from the earliest days of Tanglewood had shared its aspirations and its achievements, were no longer among those present and will not come again.

New faces and a younger generation, who soon must carry on the great traditions, are rapidly taking over where older folks left off, and are going forward. This has been a year of great transition, but the question of an even more glorious future for Tanglewood has never for one moment been in doubt.

Among those whom we knew in yesteryears and still are hale and hearty, with a helping hand for everyone, were our good friends Officer Tom Broderick, in the parking lot, and Frank Carlon and Laurence Naughton and Jim Gazaw without whose assistance Tanglewood would not be Tanglewood to a score of bewildered motorists.

George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under whose supervision details of the entire summer's program are worked out, has a technique which in many ways reminds one of Dr. Frank Boyden of Deerfield Academy. Quietly, and without commotion, George is constantly on the go during the evening or the afternoon of a program, ever alert to discover and to straighten out difficulties before they become problems, much as is the practice of Dr. Boyden.

Nicholas Sommerfield of Northampton, a student at the Harvard Law school, and Mrs. George Edmans assisted George with many of the details and with all of the publicity.

It always saddens us just a little, this last concert at Tanglewood, for with its dying echoes, the first faint voice of autumn is heard calling from beyond the hills. Another summer is gone.

Sumac blooms are deep maroon on dusty highways this week and Joe Pye weed fills wayside clearings. On the road that passes the old Hathaway place in Savoy, to twist its way down the mountain into West Hawley, not far from the Number 7 school, just before one comes to the home of Mr. and Mrs. D. Harwood, on the right hand side of the road, on a little knoll, is the most gorgeous patch of scarlet bunch berries one ever saw. It covers an area of perhaps 300 square feet. Its massive coloring is worth traveling many miles to enjoy. We suggest, however, that visitors to the place, turn around at the next house down the road and do not attempt to continue all the way down the hill into West Hawley, unless the driver is used to county roads and the car has good brakes. The road is not bad, but at one place it is sharply winding and very steep. However, we shall return home again that way on Sunday, from Tanglewood, and thus close a pleasant afternoon of music with a feast of color.

Berkshire Music Festival Continues in 12th Season

MEMORIAL CONCERTS FOR SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY MARK CURRENT SERIES

By Francis Coleman

(Special to Le Lingot

LENOX, Mass. — A great new Berkshire Mutsic Festival has opened, saddened only in being the first to be held following the death of its founder, Serge Koussevitzky who died on June 4 of this year at his country home close to the giant Music Shed he helped build, on the historic and beautiful grounds of "Tanglewood."

Charles Munch, the new musical director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had been scheduled to make his debut at Tanglewood this summer, inherited the festival, and has left the bulk of the already established programs unchanged. Close associates of the late Dr. Koussevitzky, such as his conducting protegés Leonard Bernstein and Eleazar de Carvalho are to appear on the regular main festival concerts.

Koussevitzky's famous project, the Berkshire Music Center, designed as a six weeks course of study "on an advanced level through experience in actual music performance," is now in its ninth season. Its plans are more ambitions than ever, with full scale productions this summer of such elaborate operas as the Richard Strauss "Ariadne auf Naxos", and Tschaikovsky's "Dame de Pique". Both are seldom staged, and will be heard in new English versions with leading professional singers attached to the school, with a full orchestra conducted by Boris Goldovsky, head of the opera department.

A CONCERT A DAY

Before the last concert is heard on Sunday afternoon Aug. 12th, with M. Munch conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra in an all Brahms program, eight other major events will have been presented by the three main series on concerts on Thursday and Saturday evenings, coupled to Sunday afternoons, along with a host of students and other events.

There is virtually a program of interest on every date of the Berkshire Music Festival calendar, including many operatic events, student orchestras and chamber groups choral concerts, lectures, classes, and the unique Tanglewood "Composer's Forums" under the direction of Aaron Copland. The guest teacher in composition this summer is Luigi Dallapiccola, a prominent Italian composer.

Admission to all student events is arranged through a donation to the "Friends of the Berkshire Music Center." One of the main features of Tanglewood of course is that there is always room at all events, even when a concert attracts close to 20,000 rapt listeners. The spacious lawns, walks and inspiring natural surroundings add nature's tribute to the festival, and make conditions ideal for listening to music. There are all degrees of informality, which can include hearing all the concerts from the surface of the lawn if desired!

VARIED PROGRAMS

Mr. Munch has a number of famous works from the French repertoire to conduct, including the seldom heard original version of Ravel's ballet "Daphnis et Chloé" with chorus, the same composer's "Rapsodie Espagnole", Symphony No 3 of Roussel, the 5th symphony of Honegger, Franck's D minor symphony, the Berlioz's "Fantastiqué," and the 3rd symphony of Camille Saint-Saens with organ.

As a special concession, Mr. Munch is to appear in Montreal again next season, the only engagements he accepts in America outside of his regular duties with the Boston Symphony.

Another special feature will be the memorial performance for Dr. Koussevitsky on Aug. 9 of the mighty Beethoven "Missa Solemnis", with Bernstein directing. On the following day, the annual "Tanglewood on Parade" will be held, where all departments give a practical exhibition of their work in a glorified three-ring musical circus that is climaxed by specially written works, and another extra concert of the Boston Symphony.

Once again the public will be admitted at a small charge which is donated to the pension fund of the orchestra, to Saturday morning rehearseals. The Boston Symphony inaugured a series of radio broadcasts some years ago with the same procedure of letting all hear this magnificent ensemble in its working dress. It is an experience hard to match for breathtaking unity of expression and intimate precision and collaboration.

Some 400 pupils are in the school, including Canadian artists chosen from preliminary auditions last spring. The Montreal soprano, Michèle Bonhomme, is in the opera department thanks to a special scholarship.

Those who have experienced Tanglewood will be anxious to make a return visit in this twelfth season, and those that have never been, will have a rare treat in store if they make the journey to the Berkshire hills of western Massachusetts. As a musical holiday it is still matchless, with anything similar - far or near!

TANGLEWOOD ENDS 14TH MUSIC FETE

Record Receipts of $249,000 Reported From an Estimated 126,700 Paid Admissions

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 12—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch directing, concluded the fourteenth Berkshire Festival at Tanglewood this afternoon with an all-Brahms program. In spite of overcast skies and a slight drizzle, 12,250 persons gave a prolonged ovation that increased in volume at each recall of the new musical director.

Last night a record crowd of 15,300 jammed the Shed and covered the wide lawn as Mr. Munch led the orchestra in a program that included the First Symphony of Beethoven, Honnegger's Fifth symphony and the "Pathetique" of Tchaikovsky.

At the gate it has been a record year for the Berkshire Festival, with this year's estimated receipts reaching the all-time high of $249,000 as against last year $243,400. Total attendance fell off somewhat, with an estimated 126,700 paid admissions as contrasted with 128,100 last year. A general advance in the price of tickets accounted for the greater gross receipts.

Tribute to Munch

Last night's record attendance for a concert performance was a tribute to Mr. Munch's growing hold over this summer's audiences. One has to go back to 1947 to find a comparable figure, and then the record for a single performance was 14,700.

This afternoon's all-Brahms program opened with the "Variations on a Theme by Hayden," and was followed by the Second symphony in D major. The concluding number was the Fourth symphony in E minor.

The idea of a music festival in the Berkshires was conceived by Henry Hadley, the conductor, and its organization was headed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith in June, 1934. By August of that year, the first festival, of three concerts, was held at the Dan Hanna farm horse-ring, with 2,000 persons viewing each performance. In a wooden music shell, sixty-five players of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony were led by Mr. Hadley. In 1935 a second festival was held on the same site, this time under a tent. Rain marred the performance, and attendance dropped off considerably.

Koussevitzky Took Charge

Then in 1936 Dr. Serge Koussevitzky agreed to conduct three concerts, this time at Holmwood in Stockbridge, the Westinghouse estate, owned by Mrs. Margaret Emerson. Attendance jumped to 15,000.

In the winter of 1936 the estate of Tanglewood was presented to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Mrs. Gorham Brooks and the scope of the festival increased. Then it was decided to raise $80,000 to erect a permanent shed. This was done by the festival committee, and the present shed was erected in time for the festival of 1938.

After the war, under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky, Tanglewood included a great music center, which had been opened in July, 1940.

New Music String Quartet Gives 2d Willeke Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The New Music String Quartet played the second of two concerts in honor of the late Willem Willeke yesterday afternoon in the Temple of Music on South Mountain. They had been presented by the South Mountain Association of which Mr. Willeke had been director for 30 years. The members of the quartet are Broadus Earle and Matthew Raimondi, violins, Walter Trampler, viola, Claus Adam, violoncello.

They opened their program with a quartet by a little known contemporary of Bach: Johann Friedrich Fasch. Bach seems to have regarded him highly. The quartet, as music, is mainly of archeological value; as a piece to show the tonal attributes of the New Music young men, it is ideal. It also proves how evolution makes progress while at the same time it works changes. The quartet moves from slow to fast and repeats the formula. An afternoon of this would become deadly in its monotony and lack of surprise. Even Bach wrote in sequences of contrasting dance rhythms which, in later quartets and symphonies, came to enclose four distinct movements within one framework.

In the Haydn B minor, Opus 64, No. 2, the fine impression the quartet makes of four firmly capable artists in each corner was further strengthened. The inner voices have a substance and a beauty which is not always contributed by the corresponding positions of other ensembles. This Haydn makes the four parts interesting for the participants and not mere accompaniments to a solo violin. The interchange of themes and phrases finds the quartet impressively and equally strong in their individual capacities. Their Haydn had nice style and pleasant character.

The major work on their program was the Brahms C minor quartet. This had been chosen particularly as a tribute to Mr. Willeke, who, while a mere child and youth in his teens, had been befriended by the elder composer. The performance was convincing and of great tonal beauty. In a work so often played in this hall of great traditions, this rendition takes it place with honor. We have tried to maintain that Brahms is usually played at swifter speeds than he himself may have envisaged. The New Music judgment seemed to testify to the contrary against which there can be no argument. When it can be so beautiful as the first movement sounded yesterday, it is futile to oppose such a conception. We can only suppose that virtuosi are sometimes deceived by their own prowess.

This was the second appearance of this lately organized ensemble in this vicinity within a period of weeks. Both times they struck days of excessive humidity, which made strings an exceptional source of harassment. They deserve a chance to play under completely favorable conditions.

All-Brahms Program To Be Given by Boston Symphony

TANGLEWOOD — After leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra in three symphonies tonight, Charles Munch will conduct an all-Brahms program tomorrow afternoon, in the final concert of the 1951 Berkshire Festival.

Tonight's program will include Beethoven's First Symphony, Honegger's Fifth and Tchaikovsky's Sixth ("Pathetique").

Tomorrow's concert will open with "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," to be followed by the Symphony No. 2 in D major and the Symphony No. 4 in E minor.

The Variations was first performed in Vienna in November, 1873, before an enthusiastic audience. The Second Symphony was first played by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in December, 1877, Hans Richter conducting, a year after his First Symphony had its premier by the Karlsruhe Orchestra.

The composer directed the first performance of the Fourth Symphony at Meiningen. It was received with mixed comment and considerable coldness, like the second, like all his works at the time they appeared.

The last student event will be a chamber music concert tomorrow morning at 10, with the following program.

Concerto for Piano, Violin and String Quartet ..... Chausson
Octet for Flute, Clarinet and Two Bassoons, Trumpets and Trombones ..... Stravinsky
Octet for Strings ..... Mendelssohn

The demand for tickets is heavier than for any other series. A few seats are available at the box office, with admission to the grounds.

spending the greater part of the day" inspecting the Berkshire Music Center with its founder and director.

"But I cannot speak as an intimate friend," she said. "I knew him from afar, as a man who gave color and real inspiration to anything which he touched . . . from afar, we admired and enjoyed him. When we came close, we felt a part of what his intimate friends did.

"He had vitality and vision and a determination to do something which he felt would leave a lasting memory of the music he loved. Tanglewood is a living memorial to a very great man."

Mrs. Roosevelt, who gestured in restrained fashion as she spoke into the public address system on the stage of the Shed, was dressed in a dark blue and white, afternoon-length print dress. She carried a white pocketbook which she put on the stand during her speech.

At the close of her talk, which took place between two orchestral selections, she returned down the right-hand aisle to her box. Persons lining the aisle burst into enthusiastic applause as she went by.

Mrs. Roosevelt arrived at Tanglewood around 6 last evening, had a picnic supper on the lawn outside the Shed with Mrs. Edward Elliott and Dr. David Gurewitsch, and sat on a blanket on the lawn for the choral concert at 7 from the porch of the main house. She left for her Hyde Park home soon after the Boston Symphony orchestra concert in the Shed.

Carnival Gaiety Adds to Concert

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

The main event in the annual "Tanglewood on Parade" was the concert in the Music Shed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in which the four eminent conductors of the Berkshire Music Center faculty each made a single appearance.

The crowds, which during the afternoon had been dispersed all over the broad grounds attending the many and varied demonstrations of the five-ring circus, slowly converged on the Shed at 8 o'clock for the main event of the day.

Each conductor chose a work from one of the categories in which he is most happy and most securely ensconced in the public's regard. Thus it was not at all surprising to hear Eleazar de Carvalho open the concert with some Berlioz. Next came Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra, doing the accompaniments for violinist Ruth Posselt; third, Charles Munch in Debussy, after which he introduced Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, and, to close, Leonard Bernstein conducting the orchestra from the keyboard where he played Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue."

Although there was a gala spirit with a degree of carnival gaiety in the brightly illuminated schedule, everyone played and made his contribution as though it were a serious and important moment in the Festival. De Carvalho made the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture colorful in his useful forcefully contrasted way; Miss Posselt fortunately was heard in two short numbers that served better to show her brilliant violinistic gifts than the vehicles in which she last appeared under these auspices. The Bloch "Nigun" showed the breadth and depth of her tonal attributes while the seldom-heard Arbos "Tango Espagnol" proved to be astonishing fireworks. The orchestral accompaniments were done with great discretion by Mr. Burgin.

Mr. Munch's reading of "The Sea" had its expected distinction and Leonard Bernstein's "Rhapsody" had all the contagious release this work always arouses.

In programs of this nature there is at times the possibility that those taking part consider it some thing of a parade or contest or even vaudeville bill of fare, but each one gave of his best last night and showed his proper special talents to his highest ability. The orchestra responded with full accord and made it evident, in addition, when they, at the outset, joined with the audience in applauding Mr. Carvalho.

Music Center Makes Awards

TANGLEWOOD—Following the last student concert at Tanglewood this afternoon, three special cash prizes are being awarded by the Berkshire Music Center: Jascha Heifetz award, the Gregor Piatigorsky award and the Samuel Wechsler commission.

On the basis of co-operative effort, talent and future promise the awards are as follows: The Heifetz prize to two violinists, Jeanne Sandbank and Ma Si Hon of Boston; the Piatigorsky prize to two cellists, Marti Ruth Knauer of Indianapolis, Ind., and Robert Sayre of Cleveland, Ohio; the Wechsler commission to a former student of composition for a short choral or chamber work, to Harld Shapero of Newton Center.

The prizes are in addition to special scholarships announced earlier in the season and to other forms of financial aid given deserving students.

All the recipients of today's awards are advanced in their musical careers. Mr. Shapero, a student at Tanglewood in 1940, 1941 and 1946, studied with Aaron Copland and other noted composers. His Symphony for Classical Orchestra was given its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Leonard Bernstein conducting, at Symphony Hall in 1949.

Miss Sandbank, a student at the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, has appeared with the Zimbler Sinfonietta in Boston. Ma Si Hon attended schools in Hong Kong and China and is a student at the New England Conservatory, Boston. Miss Knauer holds a degree from the Oberlin Conservatory of Music and this season has the Frederic Mann Scholarship at Tanglewood. Mr. Sayre also studied at Curtis and played cello for the Denver Orchestra before joining the Cleveland Orchestra.

Miss Alberts To Sing At Church on the Hill

Miss Eunice Alberts, contralto soloist in the memorial presentation of the "Missa Solemnis" Thursday at Tanglewood, will sing "Aria" from St. Matthew's Passion by Bach and "Pazane and Chaconne" by Henry Pursell at the service of the Church on the Hill, Congregational, Lenox, tomorrow morning at 11. She will be accompanied by a violin obligato and a stringed quartet.

Music 'Parade' Nets $16,487 For Center

Mrs. Roosevelt Pays Glowing Tribute To Koussevitzky

Tanglewood went on parade last night before 10,000 music lovers who contributed $16,487 to the Berkshire Music Center.

Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt shared the spotlight at the benefit event with the Music Center leaders, the 400 students, the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductors Charles Munch, Leonard Bernstein, Eleazar de Carvalho and Richard Burgin.

Prior to the main concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Music Shed, the students had a chance to show what they have learned in the six weeks since the school was opened.

There were so many activities going on at once that hundreds rushed from one end of the grounds to the other to make sure they didn't miss at least part of a performance. The opera students sang in the theatre concert hall; the student symphony orchestra performed in the Shed; other musicians played in the chamber music hall and the chorus entertained on the porch of the main house.

The weather was ideal and everyone seemed to be having a good time—even after the door prizes were awarded, when scores of people took advantage of the opportunity to waltz on the lawn, closing the evening's program.

Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the late conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who founded the Berkshire Music Center in 1940, was in her box for the entire performance by the BSO in the Music Shed.

Stresses Artistic Values

In her brief speech, Mrs. Roosevelt declared that the vitality and vision of the late Dr. Koussevitzky have helped Americans to mature and to appreciate the aspirations of peoples in other parts of the world.

Mrs. Roosevelt said Dr. Koussevitzky made a contribution to "our own growth in this country and our power to understand the artistic values that the rest of the world cares for. We were helped to grow up.

"I am sure that in the hearts of many here there is gratitude for his inspiration, his work, his vision and his devotion to an ideal.

"Many people say we are losing the power to live up to our ideals. But the faith and vision of men like Dr. Koussevitzky teach us that ideals do not die. We can live by them today, and when we do, we make a lasting contribution to the community in which we live and the world at large."

Mrs. Roosevelt, who was introduced by Music Director Charles Munch as "our great friend and the world's friend," began by recalling her appearance at Tanglewood on Parade last year as narrator in Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf." Before that performance, she had "the rare privilege of

Deuxième saison du festival de musique de Berkshire

Plusieurs concerts dédiés à la mémoire de Serge Koussevitsky

(exclusif au "Lingot" par Francis Coleman)

Lenox, Mass. — Le festival de musique de Berkshire vient de débuter pour une nouvelle saison, assombrie seulement par la mort de son fondateur, Serge Koussevitsky, décédé, le 4 juin dernier, à sa maison de campagne située dans le site historique et enchanteur de Tanglewood, tout près du grand théâtre musical qu'il a aidé à construire.

Charles Munch, le nouveau directeur musical de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston, qui doit faire ses débuts à Tanglewood cet été, a été chargé de l'organisation du festival et a décidé de n'apporter aucune modification à l'ensemble du programme déjà établi. De fidèles associés du Dr Koussevitsky, tels que ses protégés Léonard Bernstein et Eléazar de Carvalho, seront au programme des principaux concerts du festival.

Le fameux projet de Koussevitsky, le Centre musical de Berkshire, où l'on suivra un stage d'études avancées de six semaines sur les représentations musicales actuelles, en est maintenant à sa neuvième saison d'exécution. Il suscite des ambitions croissantes puisque l'on y produira cet été sur une haute échelle des opéras tels que l'"Ariadne auf Naxos" de Richard Strauss et la "Dame de pique" de Tschaikovsky. Ces deux pièces sont rarement mises en scène et l'on en fera entendre la nouvelle version anglaise interprétée par d'éminents chanteurs de profession de l'école accompagnés par un orchestre sous la direction de Boris Goldovsky, chef de la section d'opéras.

UN CONCERT PAR JOUR

Le dernier concert de la saison sera présenté le dimanche 12 août, au cours de l'après-midi, par l'orchestre symphonique de Boston sous la direction de M. Munch et comportera un programme entièrement consacré à la musique de Brahms. A la clôture de la saison, huit événements musicaux importants auront été présentés au cours de la triple série de concerts qui auront lieu les dimanche après-midi, jeudi et vendredi soir, en plus de certaines représentations étudiantes et autres.

On a prévu un programme des plus intéressants pour chacune des séances musicales de la saison du festival de Berkshire. Il comprend, entre autres, plusieurs représentations d'opéras et de musique de chambre, des concerts donnés par des chorales et des orchestres d'étudiants, des cours et causeries et le fameux forum des compositeurs de Tanglewood. Le professeur de composition invité cet été est un éminent compositeur italien, M. Luigi Dallapiccola.

VARIETES DES PROGRAMMES

M. Munch dirige plusieurs oeuvres célèbres tirées du répertoire français dont la version originale et rarement présentée du ballet "Daphnis et Chloé" avec choeur, de Ravel, sa "Rapsodie Espagnole", la Symphonie no 3 de Roussel, la 5e Symphonie de Honegger, la Symphonie en ré mineur de Franck, la Symphonie fantastique de Berlioz et la 3e Symphonie de Camille Saint-Saëns avec accompagnement d'orgue.

M. Munch a consenti par faveur spéciale à accepter un nouvel engagement à Montréal au cours de la prochaine saison, mais c'est le seul qu'il consent en Amérique hors de ses occupations ordinaires à l'orchestre symphonique de Boston.

Un autre événement à l'agenda de cette saison aura lieu le 9 août prochain alors qu'un concert comportant au programme l'émouvante "Missa Solemnis" de Beethoven et sous la direction de Bernstein sera dédié à la mémoire du Dr Koussevitsky. Le lendemain, le "concours annuel de "Tanglewood" donnera lieu à une démonstration exceptionnelle qui mettra en évidence le travail des diverses sections du Centre musical. L'exécution de certaines compositions spécialement écrites pour la circonstance et un dernier concert de l'orchestre symphonique de Boston clôtureront brillamment ce spectacle de gala.

Le public sera de nouveau admis, à peu de frais, aux répétitions du samedi matin. Les sommes recueillies à cette occasion seront attribuées au fonds de pension de l'orchestre. L'orchestre symphonique de Boston a inauguré, il y a quelques années une série d'émissions radiophoniques qui ont permis au public d'admirer ce magnifique ensemble musical. L'unité de l'ensemble et la précision de jeu des artistes donnent un résultat difficilement surpassable.

L'école compte environ 400 élèves parmi lesquels on compte des artistes canadiens choisis le printemps dernier à la suite d'auditions préliminaires.

Grâce à l'octroi d'une bourse spéciale, la soprano montréalaise Michèle Bonhomme étudie actuellement à la section d'opéras.

Les mélomanes qui se sont déjà rendus à Tanglewood désireront sûrement y retourner pour cette deuxième saison musicale et ceux qui n'y sont jamais allés feront un voyage vraiment inoubliable en se rendant dans cette région montagneuse de Berkshire située à l'ouest du Massachusetts. Comme régal musical, c'est insurpassable et de telles vacances sont inégalées!

Tanglewood Finale Attended by 12,250

Boston Herald August 13

LENOX, Aug. 12 (AP)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra ended its 70th year by closing the Berkshire music festival at Tanglewood this afternoon. Officials reported a paid attendance of 126,000 for the public performances at Tanglewood during the last six weeks.

The crowd that poured into Tanglewood for the final series was the largest on record for a week-end concert. This afternoon 12,250 overflowed the music shed and covered the grounds despite the drizzling rain.

Last night's crowd of 15,800 was the largest on record for a single performance since the music festival was established in 1934. Thursday night's crowd of 8000 made the week-end total 36,050 exclusive of the 10,000 who turned out Friday night for the Tanglewood on Parade program held for the benefit of the Berkshire music festival.

George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, reported that total receipts at Tanglewood this season are estimated at $249,000.

Leonard Bernstein To Wed Actress

Boston Herald August 13

LENOX, Aug. 12—The engagement of Leonard Bernstein, internationally known composer, conductor and pianist, to Miss Felicia Montealegre, Chilean born actress, was announced tonight by Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky, widow of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor.

The announcement was made at a buffet supper for the faculty of Tanglewood—Berkshire music center founded by Koussevitzky. Bernstein, a world famous conductor, has been conducting at Tanglewood this summer.

Miss Montealegre, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Roy Cohn of San Francisco, is appearing as a T-V actress in this country presently. Her home is in New York city. Cohn is a retired Chilean businessman.

Bernstein, a native of Lawrence, said the wedding will take place within the next month.

HERALD TRIBUNE, MONDAY, AUGUST 13

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

By Arthur Berger

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 12.—Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the final concert of the fourteenth Berkshire Music Festival this afternoon. According to precedent, as the season reached its close the attendance figures soared and though rain fell during a good part of this afternoon's Brahms program, some 12,000 people were in the audience. Despite the weather, a large number of listeners heard the concert from the lawn, with the trees, umbrellas and raincoats as protection. Last night, favorable weather and a program including Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique" Symphony attracted an all-time record crowd of 15,800. At intermission time the cars were still pouring in, and the one-mile stretch from the center of Lenox to the Tanglewood gates was still tied up.

The final week end's count helped bring up a figure that was lagging slightly behind last year's total. This summer's attendance, taking into account the nine major public concerts of the Boston Symphony, "Tanglewood on Parade" and the Bach-Mozart concerts of the reduced orchestra, came to 126,700, which is only about 1,400 fewer than last year's attendance.

The most striking musical event of the final week end was Honegger's Fifth Symphony, performed last night. Mr. Munch spared no effort to put this work across in a fervent and inspired reading. The audience's response to its dissonant, bitonal texture, its force and grandness, was very warm. This recently completed work of the prominent French composer renewed the impression it made in New York and Boston last season. It has more than a few points of unusual interest, and it is Honegger in his best and most representative vein. Mr. Munch's conducting of the standard works revealed once again his strong musicianship and drive, but the interpretations and the tempos were erratic. He gives the impression of sensing the final cadence of a movement as soon as he begins it. He wastes no time in its course, and this has its advantages. But details tend to get lost. Changes of pace, moreover, do not always occur at the points where they are most appropriate, and they seem to surprise both the attentive listener and the members of the orchestra. The general response to this first season without the dominating presence of Serge Koussevitzky seems, all in all, to be a very favorable one, however.

Tanglewood Memorial To Koussevitzky

Special to The Christian Science Monitor

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass.

Leonard Bernstein conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Berkshire Festival Chorus Thursday in a performance of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis dedicated to the memory of Serge Koussevitzky.

There was agony, there was struggle, there was overriding joy in the Beethoven-Bernstein combination; but there was neither intentional nor incidental melancholy and no lachrymal introspection.

Mr. Bernstein understood and exploited all the latent drama of the work. In his hands the five divisions of the Mass emerged as five contrasting but related episodes. Beethoven himself described the Missa Solemnis as "coming from the heart" and hoped that "it again may reach the heart."

The work is as rich in reference to a compact brotherhood of man as it is in recognition of a fearful fatherhood of God. For every shattering outburst of light emitted by the "Gloria in excelsis," "Quoniam tu solus sanctus," and "Pleni sunt coeli," there were more intimate utterances for the words "Et in terra pax," "Et incarnatus est" and finally (in the great concluding strophe which Beethoven designated a prayer for inner and outward peace) the supplication, "Dona nobis pacem."

Mr. Bernstein; Hugh Ross, who trained the chorus; the soloists, Adele Addison, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, and James Pease; and the organist, E. Power Biggs, deserve high praise for undertaking the work and bringing it off in accordance with Beethoven's injunction on the first page of the score, "with devotion."

Last Tanglewood Programs

The last two regular Shed concerts of this fourteenth Berkshire Festival will be devoted to the playing of symphonies.

Tonight Charles Munch, music director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a program consisting of Beethoven's First Symphony, Honegger's Fifth Symphony, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetique." Sunday afternoon Mr. Munch will lead the orchestra in a Brahms concert that will include the Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and the Second and Fourth Symphonies.

Berkshire Prizes Awarded

Three cash prizes, named for their donors, have been presented to deserving musicians by the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood. These prizes are the Jascha Heifetz Award, the Gregor Piatigorsky Award, and the Samuel Wechsler Commission.

On the basis of cooperative effort, talent, and future promise, the awards were made this year as follows:

Jeanne Sandbank and Ma Si Hon, violinists of Boston, received the Heifetz Award. Two cellists—Marti Ruth Knauer of Indianapolis, Ind., and Robert Sayre of Cleveland, Ohio—received the Piatigorsky Award. The Wechsler Commission was given to Harold Shapero of Newton Center, Mass., a former student of composition at the Berkshire Music Center. Mr. Wechsler is also a former Tanglewood student.

The award winners are all well advanced in their careers. Mr. Shapero studied with Aaron Copland at Tanglewood in 1940, 1941, and 1946. His Symphony for Classical Orchestra was given its première by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Jan., 1948, at Symphony Hall, Leonard Bernstein conducting.

Miss Sandbank, a student at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, appeared with the Zimbler Sinfonietta in Cambridge. Mr. Ma attended schools in Hong Kong, hina, and is now a student at the ew England Conservatory.

Miss Knauer holds a degree om the Oberlin Conservatory of usic. This summer she has held e Frederic Mann Scholarship at anglewood. Mr. Sayre studied at urtis Institute and played cello r the Denver Orchestra before king his current post in the cello ction of the Cleveland Orhestra.

Symphonie Pathetique

To the Editor of THE EAGLE:—

Allow me to make a couple of corrections. First a minor one: "Symphonie Pathetique," which is to be played at Tanglewood tonight, was dedicated to the composer's nephew, not uncle as The Eagle said yesterday. The more important matter is the misinformation in the Festival's program notes. Its author says that "the emotional message (of this symphony) must have emanated from the inmost nature of the composer," but that the connection is difficult to perceive and "it will be perceived least of all by the artist himself." In other words, he thinks Tchaikovsky did not understand it any better than he the critic!

The composer told both Rimsky-Korsakov and Dr. Damrosch that this symphony is about a story, but he wouldn't tell what. Such music must have a grand story. The composer must have been afraid of the anger of an influential source, like the czar or the church. But as secret codes are broken, it should not be difficult to decipher the story of this eloquent music.

Referring to the phonograph records, the first side is full of frantic phrases, anticipating and warning of coming tragedy. The second record side opens with a most beautiful and tender pleading melody, repeated three times, with warnings in between. Whoever in history pleaded three times, with warnings in between?

After the third pleading (in the third record side), the music suddenly turns to a noisy scene, presumably the enemies of the hero marching off with clubs, torchlight and all. After awhile there is a pause, and someone speaks very gently, and then confusion breaks loose again.

Record side 4 depicts tribulation. Early in it there is a short pause, and then the drums and gongs announce something, presumably a verdict. That beautiful and tender melody returns again like a prayer.

Record sides 5 and 6 describe an ungraceful dance in 5/4 time. Could it be that the enemies of the hero are celebrating? Record sides 7 and 8 depict a procession, and very soon it becomes clear that it must be to the place of execution. Record side 9 tears one's heart out. Record side 10 is clearly a dirge for burial.

Is there more than one story that fits this music?

12,250 at Tanglewood For Final Performance Despite Bad Weather

Season's Total Receipts Estimated at $249,000; Charles Munch Has Won Favor of Record Audiences; Berkshire Music School May Be Suspended

By WILLARD M. CLARK

Lenox, Aug. 12 — The Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood ended this afternoon with 12,250 people in attendance in spite of inclement weather. The 15,800 audience which attended the concert Saturday night was, we were told, an all-time record for a single concert. Although all figures are not in, an estimated 126,700 persons paid admission for the 15 chamber music and orchestral concerts and Tanglewood on Parade.

Total Receipts $249,000

Thursday night's crowd of 8000 made the week end total of 36,050 exclusive of the 10,000 who turned out Friday night for the Tanglewood on Parade program held for the benefit of the Berkshire Music Festival.

George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra, reported that total receipts this season are estimated at $249,000.

What next season will bring forth is not yet known. There are rumors that the Berkshire Music School may be suspended as it is not self-supporting, but announcement in this final program notes that there will be a "Tanglewood 1952" and that the Berkshire Music Center will observe its 10th anniversary.

The season has suffered somewhat from the vagaries of the weather. Also, there was a natural hesitancy on the part of many to spend their money for something of which they were not sure. They wondered just what Charles Munch would be like. Attendance rose as the season continued, for Charles Munch immediately established a rapport with his audiences. His gracious, unassuming manner quite won the audience.

There have been disappointing performances, notably, the Cesar Franck Symphony, the Ravel, "Daphne and Chloe" second suite and the Strauss Opera "Ariadne on Naxos." Tanglewood audiences have had to learn to accept performances given within a smaller framework, and to let meticulous attention to detail make up for the vast tumult of sound which has made for electrifying performances in the past.

Two Fine Programs

The interpretation and performance of the programs this afternoon and last night made up in many ways for any of the misgivings which followed performances earlier in the season. The program this afternoon was devoted to Brahms. It opened with his "Variations on a Theme by Haydn" and continued with the second and fourth symphonies.

From the first clear statement of the exquisite theme it was evident that we were in for an afternoon of sheer music and that is just what we got. The variations were played with complete awareness of its complex detail. It was justly paced and its contrasts were clearly set forth. Again, in the second symphony, one heard a performance which was a marvel of sensitivity, clarity and persuasiveness. The same may be said of the reading of the fourth symphony. It was bright, zestful and entirely exhilarating. The orchestra responded magnificiently.

The Saturday night program opened with a delicious performance of Beethoven's First Symphony. Just as he had seemed devoted to the music of Haydn, during the chamber music concerts devoted to that composer, Mr. Munch gave us a lovely, buoyant delineation of Beethoven's first endeavor in symphonic form, a work closely allied to Haydn.

Many years have passed since Beethoven wrote his first symphony and Arthur Honnegger wrote his fifth. In fact, the Honnegger opus was completed last December in Paris. It is by far his greatest achievement. We expected it to be harsh and dissonant, but were totally unprepared for its dark-hued beauty and complete integration of mood, its perpetual motion and rhythmically incisive episodes. Its mood, for the greater part, is tragic, its melodies sombre and magically tempered.

Munch's Greatest Test

The Honegger Symphony was followed by Tschaikowsky's sixth symphony, familiarly known as the "Pathetique." Whether Mr. Munch realized it or not, he was facing his greatest audience test for the Tschaikowsky symphonies have been a tradition at Tanglewood since Dr. Koussevitzky took over. They have drawn huge audiences which have been made almost hysterical by the Koussevitzky flair for producing raw tumult.

Last night, for the first time in years, we heard the "inside" of this symphony. Within a reasonable tonal framework, Mr. Munch provided a truly superb performance, rich in detail, wonderfully contrasted as to mood, and utterly sincere in every measure. No wonder the audience called him back a dozen times after its conclusion. He received a richly deserved ovation which he shared with the orchestra.

Tanglewood will go on, of that there seems no doubt. The Berkshire Music Center should go on, for where else are there such opportunities for young musicians to learn, and perform? Where else is there comparable intensive training for budding opera singers? Where else can the young composer hear his own works? All this, and more, becomes a fact during the six weeks' session.

Had there been no music center we might never have heard the glorious performance of Beethoven's "Missa Solemnes," conducted by Leonard Bernstein, surely the greatest single performance ever given at Tanglewood, nor would we have heard the carefully planned, splendidly integrated performance of Tschaikowsky's "Pique Dame." These achievements are the result of a single season of the school, the sum total over the years is infinitely greater. Music in America needs the Berkshire Center.

Boston Orchestra Plays Before 750,000 Persons

Lenox, Aug. 12—The 70th year of activity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Charles Munch, music director, ended today after a 45-week season during which more than 750,000 listeners attended its 212 concerts in 21 cities.

Such extensive activity by a major symphony orchestra is unique, and attests to the wide appeal that symphonic music has today. The orchestra, for the second year under the musical direction of Charles Munch, performed works by 46 composers. Only 13 were represented by more than one work.

Attendance at Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts during the past year averaged more than 2100 persons per day. Also during the year, 25 new recorded works performed by the orchestra.

The orchestra's year begins in October, when music director Charles Munch and the hundred-odd musicians return from vacation to begin rehearsals for the first concerts. The regular Boston concerts are given Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, with shorter series on Tuesday evenings and Sunday afternoons. There are five tours to nearby cities in New England, New York, and as far south as Washington, and a longer tour through the Midwest; in all, the orchestra plays 45 concerts outside Boston.

Orchestra which he brought to top heights and fame, - he educated a whole generation of young musicians; satablished Tanglewood, which provides American and world youth with a chance to complete their musical studies.

All his life, Koussevitsky has been the ardent friend of composers who found in him an interpreter of understanding and ability. Scores of young conductors were given their chance to perform on the international stage only thanks to his assistance and efforts,- from the Russian Skarjabin to the American Jew Aaaron Copland. During his last days, while conducting the Israel Philarmonic Orchestra he encouraged the playing of the symphony by Paul Ben Chajim, while the orchestra toured the United States.

His performances with the Israel Philarmonic brought into him a new life,- as if he was reborn. He aided the Ein Gev Musical Festival (The Israeli Tanglewood), joined the organisers of the Jerusalem Musical Festival at Binjanei Hauma (which will soon be completed), donated his library to the Hebrew University, his collection of instruments to the Music Department of the Ministry of Education and Culture. He tested young (Israeli) musicians and sent them to Tanglewood and made many ties with Israeli composers. He all burned with a human undeclared flame, to help, to build the musical culture, wide, deep and great in the State of Israel.

The Koussevitzky Mission

NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, who died on June 4 at the age of seventy-six, was not merely a conductor of instinctive genius. His concerts—in Russia, in France, in America—had a mission to perform. This mission was both personal and musical. It was personal because Koussevitzky had at every stage of his life served the cause of a composer, or several composers, to whom he was personally attached. It was musical, because the composers whose works he chose for performance were good and often great composers, and because Koussevitzky gave a totality of devotion to the music he played. He could not do things by halves, or even by 99 per cent. Whether it was an acknowledged masterpiece of the past that he was to conduct or a new pioneer work, it was to him, for the duration of the concert, a great piece of music.

Once when Koussevitzky conducted the "Fantastic Symphony" a modernistically-minded friend remarked to him that there was much in Berlioz's score that was sheer bombast. An expression of agony appeared on Koussevitzky's face. "Even if it is so, I don't want to discuss it," he said. "I must not think of defects when I play the music." On another occasion Koussevitzky was going over the score of Scriabin's "Divine Poem" with young Prokofieff, who offered some irreverent suggestions for improving Scriabin's orchestration, such as putting an extra bass drum in the score. Koussevitzky, visibly perturbed, cut the conversation short.

Koussevitzky was a great catalyst. He championed his cause with relentless determination until the reluctant world was willing to accept the new composers whom he promoted, or the novel interpretations of classical and romantic masterpieces which he offered to the public. But if he had influenced to a degree the musical climate of the half century, the changing times exercised a reciprocal influence on him. Koussevitzky came to America in 1924 as a champion of Russian music. He was the apostle of Scriabin, for whom he had done so much in Russia as interpreter and publisher of Scriabin's music. It was Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" that Koussevitzky featured at his opening concert in America, and Scriabin's music continued to figure on his programs for many years. But as the new type of modern music, more virile and direct in its impact, began to dominate the musical scene, Koussevitzky gradually became detached from Scriabin. During the last decade of his tenure as conductor of the Boston Symphony, Scriabin had disappeared from the programs. The old Russians—Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakov, even Moussorgsky—had similarly receded into limbo. Only Tchaikovsky held his place firmly. In this Koussevitzky followed the trend of the times, for Tchaikovsky was unexpectedly espoused by the moderns as one of the most significant creators in nineteenth-century music.

Of the modern Russians Stravinsky and Prokofieff (then still living in Paris) were high on Koussevitzky's list. It was at Koussevitzky's instigation that Stravinsky wrote his Piano Concerto, and it was Koussevitzky's practical notion that this concerto would give Stravinsky an opportunity to come to America as soloist in his own work. Koussevitzky also commissioned Stravinsky to write a work for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which resulted in the composition of the "Symphony of Psalms." Prokofieff, too, had numerous compositions performed for the first time by Koussevitzky in Paris and in Boston, and he was twice invited by Koussevitzky to conduct guest appearances of the Boston Symphony in his own works. Several Russian composers of American residence and citizenship, Nabokov, Berezowsky, Lopatnikoff, owed their careers to Koussevitzky. At least one of them, Vladimir Dukelsky, had the majority of his works performed by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky, while other American orchestras abstained.

Saturday Review of Literature
NEW YORK, N. Y.
JUN 30 1951

Koussevitzky's greatest service as a musical catalyst was the encouragement he gave to the group of American composers whose creative gifts had matured during the second quarter of the present century. Koussevitzky's first American composer was Aaron Copland. Even with Koussevitzky's unshakable hold on the Boston audiences it was an act of courage to put Copland's "jazz" Piano Concerto on the program, with the composer as soloist dispensing strange sounds in staid Symphony Hall. From that day most of Copland's major works received their first performances under Koussevitzky in Boston, being carried to New York and elsewhere on Boston Symphony tours. Walter Piston, too, was the recipient of commissions for new works from Koussevitzky. All of the symphonies by Roy Harris were given by the Boston Symphony during Koussevitzky's regime, five of them in first performance. Howard Hanson figured on his programs. Samuel Barber, William Schuman, and David Diamond were championed by Koussevitzky with undiminishing zeal. And of the younger generation Lukas Foss was welcomed by Koussevitzky into the fold.

Koussevitzky possessed an uncanny sense of musical values in new scores by unknown composers. He was rarely mistaken in pushing a new talent over the opposition of the critics, the public, and often even the members of the orchestra. This was particularly evident in the cases of Aaron Copland and Roy Harris, whose early works did not meet with general approval. The examination of the programs of the Boston Symphony during Koussevitzky's quarter of the century with that orchestra shows only one instance when Koussevitzky had given repeated performances of symphonic works by a composer who failed to live up to expectations.

This precision of judgment is explained by Koussevitzky's intensity of musical feeling. He followed his instinct rather than technical calculation of musical structure. He could overlook occasional crudity of orchestration, unnecessary dissonance, and formal diffuseness in a score, but he never failed to sense an independent talent struggling through the music. If there was one type of music that left him cold, it was the smooth, technically brilliant, learned type of music that presented no obstacle to study and performance but lacked personal warmth.

The same conviction in the correctness of his judgment that animated Koussevitzky in championing new works was the active element in his interpretations as well. As conductor, too, he was a relentless catalyst. His legendary reply to a musician who said that he could not play a difficult passage at required speed—"You must can!"—illustrates Koussevitzky's relationship with his players. This relationship, goodness knows, was not all sweetness and light, and Koussevitzky was often unreasonable in his demands on the orchestra; but as one musician put it, "Even when he tells us something that is absolutely wrong, we follow him enthusiastically."

KOUSSEVITZKY could drive the players to distraction by rehearsing individual violin stands in a Tchaikovsky symphony that, as the saying goes, they could play in their sleep. But Koussevitzky refused to let them play except in a palpitating state of vigilance. Conducting a thrice familiar work in an "unimportant" town on tour, he pressed the orchestra on with a passionate devotion that other conductors would reserve for a gala performance at Carnegie Hall. This very capacity of never-flagging musical ecstasy was the secret of Koussevitzky's appeal. Unconsciously, every listener — even a non-musical one—felt that he was getting a hundred-per-cent performance for his money. Musicians might have been painfully cognizant of unnecessary expenditure of energy in Koussevitzky's onrushing drive, in his anguished cues when the music seemed to play itself if left alone, in his insistence on conducting instrumental solo passages which are traditionally performed ad libitum—but to the audience this absorption in the music constituted a guarantee of the genuineness of the conductor's effort.

HARTFORD, CONN.

To Koussevitzky there were no secondary parts in a musical score, no transition passages to be glossed over lightly. In a Brahms symphony he would turn to the violas and dramatically underline groups of notes that are nothing more than a sectional development. He would address the violins in a familiar pleading gesture of the outstretched hands, entreating them to play with greater force when they were already exerting all their strength at a climax. He would imperiously point at the trumpets and urge them to give more when they had already given their all. Or else he would impatiently hush a drum player when the drumbeats had long reached the threshold of inaudibility. Many said that Koussevitzky was a born actor, that he enjoyed his own performance as well as the music. It may be so, but is not the conducting podium properly a stage? If the orchestra and the audience are to be impressed with the music, pedestrian restraint is hardly the means to accomplish that.

Of all conductors Koussevitzky professed unreserved admiration only for Arthur Nikisch. As a token of this admiration Koussevitzky once volunteered to play the double-bass in the orchestra when Nikisch conducted in Leipzig. (That was the time when Koussevitzky was creating a sensation as a double-bass virtuoso.) If Koussevitzky can be fitted into any category of conductors it is the Nikisch category, a sort of glorified improvisation along the lines of a rigidly predetermined interpretation. During his entire career Koussevitzky rarely changed these basic lines, even when they seemed to contradict the letter of the printed page. The improvisatory part in his performances was the prod-

Koussevitzky's greatest service as a musical catalyst was the encouragement he gave to the group of American composers whose creative gifts had matured during the second quarter of the present century. Koussevitzky's first American composer was Aaron Copland. Even with Koussevitzky's unshakable hold on the Boston audiences it was an act of courage to put Copland's "jazz" Piano Concerto on the program, with the composer as soloist dispensing strange sounds in staid Symphony Hall. From that day most of Copland's major works received their first performances under Koussevitzky in Boston, being carried to New York and elsewhere on Boston Symphony tours. Walter Piston, too, was the recipient of commissions for new works from Koussevitzky. All of the symphonies by Roy Harris were given by the Boston Symphony during Koussevitzky's regime, five of them in first performance. Howard Hanson figured on his programs. Samuel Barber, William Schuman, and David Diamond were championed by Koussevitzky with undiminishing zeal. And of the younger generation Lukas Foss was welcomed by Koussevitzky into the fold.

Koussevitzky possessed an uncanny sense of musical values in new scores by unknown composers. He was rarely mistaken in pushing a new talent over the opposition of the critics, the public, and often even the members of the orchestra. This was particularly evident in the cases of Aaron Copland and Roy Harris, whose early works did not meet with general approval. The examination of the programs of the Boston Symphony during Koussevitzky's quarter of the century with that orchestra shows only one instance when Koussevitzky had given repeated performances of symphonic works by a composer who failed to live up to expectations.

This precision of judgment is explained by Koussevitzky's intensity of musical feeling. He followed his instinct rather than technical calculation of musical structure. He could overlook occasional crudity of orchestration, unnecessary dissonance, and formal diffuseness in a score, but he never failed to sense an independent talent struggling through the music. If there was one type of music that left him cold, it was the smooth, technically brilliant, learned type of music that presented no obstacle to study and performance but lacked personal warmth.

The same conviction in the correctness of his judgment that animated Koussevitzky in championing new works was the active element in the product of what is largely described as inspiration, and success—subjective and objective—depended on the balance of form and mood. Nikisch, who lived before the day of electrical recording, left but a fleeting legend after his death. Happily, the legend of Koussevitzky has been immortalized in recorded sound. Beethoven and Brahms, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius, Berlioz and Strauss, Ravel and Debussy, Stravinsky and Prokofieff can still be heard as Koussevitzky heard them.

In his Russian avatar Koussevitzky founded a publishing house, which in its generosity to composers was without a parallel. Out of his vast fortune he undertook to pay the composers a handsome sum of money as a commission, plus the royalties. The first composer to benefit by this arrangement was Scriabin, to whom it was a matter of life or death, for he was then in very difficult financial circumstances. Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" and "Le Sacre du Printemps" were also published by Koussevitzky, as well as some Rachmaninoff works. Following the Revolution Koussevitzky's publishing activities were moved to Berlin and Paris. There, the Edition Russe de Musique, as Koussevitzky named it, published works by Prokofieff and other Russian composers residing abroad at the time. Again Koussevitzky was a catalyst, giving to the world—often over the strong opposition of the businessmen in the management—complete scores of modern masterpieces which otherwise would have waited many years for publication. The Koussevitzky imprint on the title pages of these scores is a monument to his service in behalf of modern music.

Koussevitzky left still another legacy as the founder of the Berkshire Music Center and the organizer of the Berkshire Festivals. He taught conducting; he imparted his passion for orchestral music to Leonard Bernstein, whom he called "the child of my spirit." Another favorite student of Koussevitzky, Eleazar de Carvalho, has inherited a part of Koussevitzky's musical spirit. Composers who have received commissions to write works for Koussevitzky, young conductors who studied with him, the millions who heard him in Boston, in the Berkshires, in New York, in Europe, in South America, in Israel, have in various degrees of intimacy participated in Koussevitzky's music-making. The life of no other conductor has been so rich and so versatile in fruitful achievement.

Nicolas Slonimsky is the author of "Music Since 1900" and "Music of Latin America." He was associated, some years back, with Koussevitzky as a musical secretary.

Tschaikowsky Opera Staged at Tanglewood

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Special to The Hartford Times

LENOX, MASS.—Tanglewood last night staged an opera which Serge Koussevitsky planned, talked about for a year, and all but executed.

He was to have conducted Pique Dame but that duty fell to Boris Goldovsky, who told how he and Koussevitsky, in Arizona and in Brookline, had discussed the production down to the last detail. There were to be such changes only as Koussevitsky deemed restorative of Tschaikowsky's intentions. The composer "had been forced to listen to people who knew nothing but whom he was not in a position to refute."

The music was to be uncut except for parts of the long promenade scene in Act I and some of the spectacle opera composed especially for the imperial ballet.

This explanation was made by Mr. Goldovsky before the opening curtain in a talk dedicating the production to Koussevitsky's memory. He apologized for limited facilities and unavoidably long delays between the many scene changes which would have challenged the resources of a permanent opera company.

These sets were beautiful and elaborate, the work of G. Phillippe de Rosier, the handsome costuming by Leo van Witsen. The performance required four full hours of elapsed time, ending at 12:15 a.m. This was due to the problem of handling seven complete changes of setting, creating technical demands greater perhaps than any similar opera workshop has ever faced.

GIVEN A DECOR, of magnificence, splendid voices and a teeming, variegated and dramatically articulate score do you have great opera? Not necessarily. There is still to be added an element which, for want of a better term, may be called operatic truth. In places the lack could have been remedied by better direction. You cannot create a great actress but a beautiful woman can be led about the stage plausibly. The music of genius, on the other hand, cannot be reshaped and if action has not been suited to the note there isn't much you can do about it. Tschikowsky wrote sterling music for this work but he was not stage canny and at times you could not be sure that he was entirely convinced of the reality of the dramatic business.

The opera, "The Queen of Spades," was done in English, a most serviceable translation by Mr. Goldovsky. Most of the dialog was easily followed, but it made a difference who was singing. James Pease, for instance, was superbly understandable in the narrative of the Queen of Spades in the first act. Phyllis Curtin, on the other hand, might as well have been singing in Russian a good deal of the time. It was only in her gripping and grandly sung last scene that she came over into the vernacular satisfactorily.

The story concerns Hermann, a young officer, hopelessly in love with the nobly born Lisa, whose grandmother, the Countess, is the supposed possessor of the secret of a card sequence which made her wealthy. Hermann steals into Lisa's apartment and wins her love but he is soon torn between love and cupidity. Seeking to force the aged Countess's secret he invades her bed chamber and when he threatens her with an unloaded pistol she dies of fright. During the funeral her ghost imparts the card secret to Hermann. Lisa is so disillusioned by his greed for money that she hurls herself into the Neva while Hermann whose luck fails him in the gaming room stabs himself. The scene is laid in St. Petersburg in 1820.

EUNICE ALBERTS was a macabre countess whose vocal opportunities were limited, but who took her part so seriously that it was only in the last half of the second act, which she dominated, that the drama took on suspense and illusion.

David Lloyd, whose acting was sound and consistent, also used a ringing tenor voice with intelligence and conviction. The Count Tomsky of James Pease was also most satisfying musically and in stage deportment. Mac Morgan as Prince Yeletsky had the opportunity of one fine aria and made the most of it. The final scene availed the male chorus of some brilliant Tschaikowskian measures.

The music throughout was most characteristic even to the exquisitely Mozartian accompaniment for the pantomime of the Faithful Shepherdess. From the very overture on to the last curtain were heard the rich textures of which the last three symphonies are made, not in quotation, but from the same fecund and inspired pen.

As a show this opera had its wooden spots, many striking passages and certain ineptitudes where only a very busy and beautiful score sustained interest. For an opera workshop it was perhaps over-ambitious, but if that is a fault it is easily forgiven.

MUNCH CONDUCTS 2 AMERICAN WORKS

Directs Boston Symphony in Copland and Barber Music at Berkshire Festival

By OLIN DOWNES
Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LENOX, Mass., July 29—The week-end concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival by Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered an exceptional richness of representative symphonic music.

The concert this afternoon began with the works of two Americans who were in the audience and who have earned their spurs before this with scores that Mr. Munch interpreted. It is in no wise invidious to remark that these scores, as well as their composers, were first put before the public by Dr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Munch read them with the utmost enthusiasm, and took obvious pleasure in their success with the audience. They were Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City." Mr. Barber's witty and amusing score has an Italianate flavor. The subject that suggested the music was Sheridan's "School for Scandal," but it could have been a comedy by Goldoni done in an Italian theatre. The piece, written in 1932, is in its nineteenth year, and sounds fresh, expert and spontaneous.

Mr. Copland has called the play by Irwin Shaw "The Quiet City," "a realistic fantasy of the many different people in a great city. "It called," he says, "for music evocative of the nostalgia and inner distress of a society profoundly aware of its own insecurity"—this was in 1939. The music, with the singularly evocative tone and color of the solo trumpet over the strings, has not lost its atmosphere. The expression of reverie is personal at the same time that the quality of the music is philosophic and tender.

Schubert Symphony Heard

The next piece was the perfectly adorable "Tragic" symphony, so-called, No. 4 in the succession of Schubert's works in that form. We, ourselves, rank it highest among symphonies. To call this "Tragic" is to misname the work by overstatement, as obviously the great tragic symphony of Tchaikovsky is given under-statement in nicknaming it the "Pathetic."

But Schubert's music, especially in the opening movement, is agitated, troubled, and infinitely affecting. There was no composer who sang so simply and so purely, so completely from the depths of an innocent heart. And the symphony has no weak places; even if its form and instrumentation are not those of the later works; even if, in the finale, one thinks a little of Rossini, and in the lovely slow movement of a greater model Mozart. It is to be said that Mr. Munch called forth this music in a spirit that corresponded in its simplicity and sincerity to the composer's thought.

It was his best performance of the afternoon, for it was only here that he did not yield to overexcitement and apparently that idea that only brush-strokes can be completely successful in the big auditorium. It is neither necessary nor advisable to force tone or tempo to reach the audience of thousands inside the music shed or on the lawns outside.

Hence it was that the high spirits of the Barber overture were somewhat furiously communicated; that a greater degree of nostalgia and dream might have emanated from Mr. Copland's score, and that the dramatic and passionate performance of Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor needed a profounder majesty and a nobler dignity back of its most emotional pages.

The interpretation was, of course, effective, and wholly sincere, but it lost in poise, and therefore in the greatest effect of the climaxes. There was nervousness in it, and exaggeration, natural neither to Mr. Munch when he is completely balanced and master of the situation, nor to the nature of Franck's music.

Saturday Night's Program

The concert last night was not less interesting and perhaps better proportioned than on this occasion. It began with the romantic "Oberon" overture, beautifully done. There followed the still controversial but very individual and inspired Sixth symphony of Prokofieff, which has not seemed in the past to equal the same composer's Fifth in sustained power and architecture.

For whatever the impression of the moment may mean, the Sixth seemed to us last night the richer and the more significant of the two works. The first part is powerfully dramatic and the slow movement, very passionate, melodic, and introspective, too. The finale starts with the exultant and exhilarating swiftness and élan that make one of Prokofieff's characteristic moods, a mood that easily degenerates with him into the trivial. This finale sweeps along with all imaginable Cossack fire, but at the last become arrestingly tragic and portentous. The performance was exceptionally brilliant and penetrating.

There was a very fine conclusion to the concert, when Claudio Arrau appeared as soloist in the performance of Brahms B-flat piano concerto. His performance had strength that was tempered with a tone that did not harden. The same thing can be said of the ruggedness and grasp of the scherzo; the fine texture of the middle movement; the Brahms fancy and humor of the finale.

The Saturday night audience numbered 8,800 persons; that of this afternoon 9,700. This completed the first week of the Berkshire Festival symphonic concerts.

Munch Back, Plans Concerts as Memorials to Koussevitzky

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from his European vacation yesterday with plans for two memorial concerts for Serge Koussevitzky.

"I shall conduct the last chorus of the St. Matthew Passion, he said at Logan Airport. "That will be played at Tanglewood for the memory of Koussevitzky. And when the concerts of the smaller orchestra begin at Tanglewood, we shall have the funeral music from Mozart—also for his memory."

Except for one other program change—a Sibelius symphony will be replaced with another work not yet named—Mr. Munch said he would carry on this Summer's schedule at Tanglewood just as Dr. Koussevitzky had planned it before his death.

He has taken full charge of Tanglewood activities, though he has never conducted there, and has seen the beautiful Berkshire music center only once. Three years ago he visited the French musician, Honegger, then a member of the music faculty, at Tanglewood.

Munch's first concert at Tanglewood is scheduled for Friday.

Koussevitzky's death three weeks ago cut short Munch's vacation, but he said yesterday that he had visited France—where he saw the 2000th anniversary celebration of Paris in full swing—Austria, Italy, and England.

He listened to many young composers on his trip, and said he has brought back several new compositions to be played next season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the composers he met abroad was the young Bostonian, Lukas Foss, once official pianist of the B. S. O. and now a student in Italy.

"He has a great talent," said Munch. "I have brought back his newest composition, a piano concerto, which we will have on our program this year."

RETURNS FROM EUROPE—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrives at Logan Airport yesterday. He announced plans for concerts at Tanglewood in memory of Koussevitzky.

A Southerner In New York—

Tanglewood Music Festival Takes To Two From Dixie

By RHEA TALLY

NEW YORK, July 28.—At the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., a young man from Tennessee is studying to become a composer. He is already on the way, for last year Henry Brian Dority won the George Gershwin Award for composition, one of the most important given to rising young musicians.

The prize was $1,000, awarded for a composition called "Pastorale and Allegro." Brian received his check from members of the family of the late George Gershwin, in whose honor the award is made, at a Carnegie Hall concert which featured Gershwin works. Winners of the prize generally have gone on to big accomplishments, and they generally write in the modern idiom loved by Gershwin.

Mr. Dority

The $1000 took Brian to Paris for a year of study. Coming home again, he won another prize, the Crofts Award, which gave the scholorship at Tanglewood where Aaron Copland, the well-known modern composer, is his teacher.

In the Fall Brian will come to New York to start trying to make a living as a composer.

Meanwhile the son of Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Dority of Clarksville, Tenn., is doing pretty well.

Fellow-students at Tanglewood last Sunday played a chamber cantata which he wrote under inspiration of "Romeo and Juliet."

Miss Lang

Earlier they had played another of his pieces, "Sextet for Woodwinds."

Brian has an opera in his trunk, as might be expected. His is based on a Southern theme, the mountain legend of "Barbara Allen."

Though he went to high school in Clarksville, he never really began to compose until his parents sent him away to musical college in Chicago. Brian's making up for the delay now.

Saw Munch Conduct

I met Brian on a press junket to Tanglewood in company with about 100 other writers, including Ida Clemens of The Commercial Appeal; Dorothy Coleman who was raised in Helena, Ark., and Memphis, and now writes for a Meriden, Conn., newspaper, and Nell Cotham and Betty Ann Castellaw of Little Rock.

A group of designers took us by special train to the musical center, showing us fashions en route. We heard outdoors a Haydn concert conducted by Charles Munch and during intermission talked with the students.

One other student from the South who has already achieved things is Rosalind Lang of Hot Springs, Ark.

Rosalind's name is well-known throughout her state, for she has played the violin with the Arkansas Symphony. This Winter she will go to the Rochester, N. Y., Music School to study, and will play with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. She also has a date to be soloist with the Rochester Civic Orchestra.

When Brian's chamber music piece was played at Tanglewood, Rosalind was there in the orchestra, fiddling away. She spends three hours every day studying orchestra work.

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. Lang of Hot Springs is very, very serious about her career.

Snooky Lanson Makes Good

In show business they say that the toughest assignment is to "follow" somebody good. You have to top the act before you, or else you're an anti-climax.

Well, Snooky Lanson really had it tough the other evening. At the Capitol Theater in New York, where the famous young baritone from Memphis and Nashville was singing in the stage show, the name of Snooky Lanson was billed as an extra-special attraction.

But at one performance Snooky had to follow General MacArthur.

News that the general and his wife were attending that performance caused consternation back stage. Also on the bill was Tom Ewell, the movie and stage comedian, whose mother was in town and was coming that evening, not to see her son, she insisted, but to hear Snooky Lanson. Tom was afraid that Snooky's act would "die" and his mother would blame him.

The general did say a few words from the front row of the mezzanine, introduced by Tom Ewell in his character of Willie in "Up Front." Then Snooky came on and after admitting it was a difficult spot and addressing a few remarks to the front row of the mezzanine, went into his act. It was a big hit.

"Friend For Life"

After the show, the MacArthurs went backstage to meet the cast. "I'm a neighbor of yours," Snooky told Mrs. MacArthur. "I come from close to Murfreesboro." The General said, "Son, she's your friend for life."

Snooky seems to be making friends all the time as the star singer of the television show, "Hit Parade" and as reader of commercials on "This Is Show Business" and Robert Montgomery's "Lucky Strike Theater." The Capitol assignment was his first appearance in vaudeville as a "single act," though Snooky has sung on theater stages often with the bands of Ted Weems, Ray Noble and Andy Donohue.

Snooky was born Roy Landman in Memphis, and during the recent Shriners' convention he was constantly being telephoned to say hello to some friend from Tennessee. Some of these were Dr. Sumter Anderson, Harold and Mamie Bennett, and Chalmers Cullins, the Memphis Theater man who was stage manager of the Orpheum when Snooky, just a boy, used to sing with Wilton and Webber for the Fresh Air Fund.

The Lansons have a house in Hartsdale, N. Y., and Snooky drives in for his singing chores. These hot days he's awfully glad to get back to Hartsdale and Ernie, 6, and Beth, 3.

Berkshire Festival Pays Tribute To Koussevitzky

Audience, Orchestra Stand For Moment Of Silence After Mozart Funeral Music

By JULIAN SEAMAN
Blade Staff Writer

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 27—The Berkshire Festival said a hail and farewell here last night to its founder and director, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to one of its most eminent conductors, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Charles Munch, conducting the opening concert of the shed series on the Tanglewood grounds, began his program with a memorial—Mozart's Masonic funeral music (Koechel 477).

He asked the audience not to applaud and to stand a moment in silent reverie at the end. The orchestra, too, arose and one thought of Beethoven's little sonata, "Farewell, Journey and Return."

It was a solemn and touching occasion, for even those outside the huge shed, spread upon the lawn on blankets, or musing underneath the trees in the traditional manner of Tanglewood visitors, got up with the rest and for a fleeting instant it did seem as though the departed spirit was near.

Two Orthodox Symphonies

Two orthodox symphonies constituted the rest of the program—the Schumann D Minor, first in order of writing but published as No. 4; and the Berlioz "Fantastique," which Toledoans heard done so superbly in the spring concert of the Philadelphians at the Peristyle.

The new regime of Mr. Munch has preserved much of the mellow roundness so inherent in the Boston tone. He added a new precision and edge, and something of his own propensity for an almost mathematica pline. He has one annoy dency. And that is undu which often results in unwieldy noise, making articulation almost imp The result, in the fugal of the Schumann work, trifle exasperating.

If one is privileged to the Berlioz symphony, s ously a romantic urge, a of readings, then one mu say that Mr. Munch's ap might be called eclectic mote. Yet the opiate a healthy odor that the exudes cannot be smothe such a tentative proce what Mr. Munch achieve something short of Ber the classic vein.

Has Strength, Resiliency

Yet the symphony still a surprising strength a siliency, and no latitu treatment or divergence proach to its varieties ca its essential worth. The phony itself endures, an haps Mr. Munch is right ing to prove that it will die.

John Burk, program ann of the orchestra, gives rather clear picture of th zart funeral music, there dicating its aptness for the ent occasion. Mozart com it in July of 1785, "on the of two fellow Freemasons, Duke George August von lenburg Stretlitz and Count Esterhazy von Gal Two years later, in a let his father, he wrote that h sidered death as "our bes truest friend."

This is the 14th season o glewood concerts, and in period of development the shire Festival has become ably the most celebrate America. Munch Back, Plans Concerts as Memorials to Koussevitzky

Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, returned from his European vacation yesterday with plans for two memorial concerts for Serge Koussevitzky.

"I shall conduct the last chorus of the St. Matthew Passion, he said at Logan Airport. "That will be played at Tanglewood for the memory of Koussevitzky. And when the concerts of the smaller orchestra begin at Tanglewood, we shall have the funeral music from Mozart—also for his memory."

Except for one other program change—a Sibelius symphony will be replaced with another work not yet named—Mr. Munch said he would carry on this Summer's schedule at Tanglewood just as Dr. Koussevitzky had planned it before his death.

He has taken full charge of Tanglewood activities, though he has never conducted there, and has seen the beautiful Berkshire music center only once. Three years ago he visited the French musician, Honegger, then a member of the music faculty, at Tanglewood.

Munch's first concert at Tanglewood is scheduled for Friday.

Koussevitzky's death three weeks ago cut short Munch's vacation, but he said yesterday that he had visited France—where he saw the 2000th anniversary celebration of Paris in full swing—Austria, Italy, and England.

He listened to many young composers on his trip, and said he has brought back several new compositions to be played next season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the composers he met abroad was the young Bostonian, Lukas Foss, once official pianist of the B. S. O. and now a student in Italy.

"He has a great talent," said Munch. "I have brought back his newest composition, a piano concerto, which we will have on our program this year."

RETURNS FROM EUROPE—Charles Munch, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrives at Logan Airport yesterday. He announced plans for concerts at Tanglewood in memory of Koussevitzky.

A Southerner In New York—

Tanglewood Music Festival Takes To Two From Dixie

By RHEA TALLY

NEW YORK, July 28.—At the Berkshire Music Center in Tanglewood, Mass., a young man from Tennessee is studying to become a composer. He is already on the way, for last year Henry Brian Dority won the George Gershwin Award for composition, one of the most important given to rising young musicians.

The prize was $1,000, awarded for a composition called "Pastorale and Allegro." Brian received his check from members of the family of the late George Gershwin, in whose honor the award is made, at a Carnegie Hall concert which featured Gershwin works. Winners of the prize generally have gone on to big accomplishments, and they generally write in the modern idiom loved by Gershwin.

Mr. Dority

The $1000 took Brian to Paris for a year of study. Coming home again, he won another prize, the Crofts award, which gave the scholarship at Tanglewood where Aaron Copland, the well-known modern composer, is his teacher.

In the Fall Brian will come to New York to start trying to make a living as a composer.

Meanwhile the son of Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Dority of Clarksville, Tenn., is doing pretty well.

Fellow-students at Tanglewood last Sunday played a chamber cantata which he wrote under inspiration of "Romeo and Juliet."

Miss Lang

Earlier they had played another of his pieces, "Sextet for Woodwinds."

Brian has an opera in his trunk, as might be expected. His is based on a Southern theme, the mountain legend of "Barbara Allen."

Though he went to high school in Clarksville, he never really began to compose until his parents sent him away to musical college in Chicago. Brian's making up for the delay now.

Saw Munch Conduct

I met Brian on a press junket to Tanglewood in company with about 100 other writers, including Ida Clemens of The Commercial Appeal; Dorothy Coleman who was raised in Helena, Ark., and Memphis, and now writes for a Meriden, Conn., newspaper, and Nell Cotnam and Betty Ann Castellaw of Little Rock.

A group of designers took us by special train to the musical center, showing us fashions en route. We heard outdoors a Haydn concert conducted by Charles Munch and during intermission talked with the students.

One other student from the South who has already achieved things is Rosalind Lang of Hot Springs, Ark.

Rosalind's name is well-known throughout her state, for she has played the violin with the Arkansas Symphony. This Winter she will go to the Rochester, N. Y., Music School to study, and will play with the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra. She also has a date to be soloist with the Rochester Civic Orchestra.

When Brian's chamber music piece was played at Tanglewood, Rosalind was there in the orchestra, fiddling away. She spends three hours every day studying orchestra work.

The daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. Lang of Hot Springs is very, very serious about her career.

Snooky Lanson Makes Good

In show business they say that the toughest assignment is to "follow" somebody good. You have to top the act before you, or else you're an anti-climax.

Well, Snooky Lanson really had it tough the other evening. At the Capitol Theater in New York, where the famous young baritone from Memphis and Nashville was singing in the stage show, the name of Snooky Lanson was billed as an extra-special attraction.

But at one performance Snooky had to follow General MacArthur.

News that the general and his wife were attending that performance caused consternation back stage. Also on the bill was Tom Ewell, the movie and stage comedian, whose mother was in town and was coming that evening, not to see her son, she insisted, but to hear Snooky Lanson. Tom was afraid that Snooky's act would "die" and his mother would blame him.

The general did say a few words from the front row of the mezzanine, introduced by Tom Ewell in his character of Willie in "Front." Then Snooky came on and after admitting it was a difficult spot and addressing a few remarks to the front row of the mezzanine, went into his act. It was a big hit.

"Friend For Life"

After the show, the MacArthurs went backstage to meet the cast. "I'm a neighbor of yours," Snooky told Mrs. MacArthur. "I come from close to Murfreesboro." The General said, "Son, she's your friend for life."

Snooky seems to be making friends all the time as the star singer of the television show, "Hit Parade" and as reader of commercials on "This Is Show Business" and Robert Montgomery's "Lucky Strike Theater." The Capitol assignment was his first appearance in vaudeville as a "single act," though Snooky has sung on theater stages often with the bands of Ted Weems, Ray Noble and Al Donohue.

Snooky was born Roy Landman in Memphis, and during the recent Shriners' convention he was constantly being telephoned to say hello to some friend from Tennessee. Some of these were Dr. Sumter Anderson, Harold and Mamie Bennett, and Chalmers Cullins, the Memphis Theater man who was stage manager of the Orpheum when Snooky, just a boy, used to sing with Wilton and Webber for the Fresh Air Fund.

The Lansons have a house in Hartsdale, N. Y., and Snooky drives in for his singing chores. These hot days he's anxious to get back to Hartsdale and Ernie, 6, and Beth, 3.

TANGLEWOOD, Mass., July 27—The Berkshir yal said a hail and farewell here last night to its f nd director, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra of its most eminent conductors, the late Dr. Serge sevitzky.

Charles Munch, conducting the opening concert of the shed series on the Tanglewood grounds, began his program with a memorial—Mozart's Masonic funeral music (Koechel 477).

He asked the audience not to applaud and to stand a moment in silent reverie at the end. The orchestra, too, arose and one thought of Beethoven's little sonata, "Farewell, Journey and Return."

It was a solemn and touching ccasion, for even those outside e huge shed, spread upon the n on blankets, or musing unneath the trees in the traditional manner of Tanglewood ors, got up with the rest and fleeting instant it did seem hough the departed spirit ear.

Music Center Pays Honor to Koussevitzky

LENOX, July 1—Some 380 students enrolled for the ninth season of the Berkshire Music Center today heard the Rev. Dr. Theodore P. Ferris, a trustee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, declare at the opening exercises that the center would carry on "not without our founder-director, Serge Koussevitzky, but because of him."

Dr. Lewis E. Perry, trustee of the Boston Symphony and chairman of the Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, presided. Among visitors were many leading Eastern musicians. Leonard Bernstein of Boston and a faculty board will assume direction of the center this season.

Distinguished guests included Mrs. Koussevitzky; Composer Howard Hanson from the Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., and Dr. Harold Spivacke, music director of the Library of Congress.

Unique Trip Given Group

By RUTH BARNETT

A special luxurious New Haven train left Grand Central Station, New York City, with 200 fashion editors from United States and Canada as honored guests. It was called "Train to Tanglewood."

En route there was a fall fashion show with emphasis on trend-setting news in fabric, color, texture, silhouette and a wide range of important accessories. Two special cars of the train contained exhibits and informative displays.

Arriving at Leonx, Mass., the group dined in the outdoor gardens of Eastover, one of New England's finest resort inns, where a style show was given of night-time fashions.

The next day the party went to Tanglewood, where they were the guests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra staff, and had the opportunity to view the beautiful grounds. At Tanglewood, hundreds of talented young musicians from every state in the Union (and 15 foreign countries), gather to study under such eminent musicians, conductors and composers as Serge Koussevitzky, Aaron Copland, Gregor Piatigorsky and Leonard Bernstein.

At 3 o'clock the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed an all-Haydn concert with renowned cellist Piatigorsky as the soloist.

Then all boarded the train, rejuvenated by a week-end in the Berkshires, and arrived back in

Escapes New York Heat

Hy Spends Weekend In New England

By HY YAPLE

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass.—Aboard a New York, New Haven and Hartford train bound for New York after a delightful week-end in the heart of New England, more than 110 chosen fashion editors from all over the country breathed their appreciation for surcease from the oppressive heat of New York City.

We left New York at 3 p. m. Saturday aboard a special "Train for Tanglewood," and in the space of a half hour found ourselves steaming through beautiful cool forests, dotted with charming little lakes, arriving at 7:20 p. m. at fabulous Eastover Inn at Lenox, Mass.

• • • •

After an out-of-door buffet, with the Berkshire Mountains framing us like a picture, we saw an exotic style show which included the phenominal transformation by Clairol of a "brownette" into a flame-color. The entire transformation took less than 20 minutes, and when the editors saw her Sunday, her hair was beautifully soft and natural looking in the bright sunlight.

The style show Saturday was presented by Varden Dress, Aris Gloves, Hanes Hosiery, Nelly De

Editors again felt that it was such a happy thing that we have designers such as Varden Petite Dress Co., who make the perfect costumes for the woman who is five foot five or under, which has been designated as the average American woman's figure.

When we noted the intricacies which go into the design and making of Aris gloves, shoes by Palter Deliso; pearls by Marvella, etc., we realized the great thought, effort and hard work which is back of one of America's biggest industries and art—that of dressing the American woman.

• • • •

After spending the night at the Red Lion Inn at Stockbridge, where we actually found the traditional "three pence" on the floor of our room, we went to Tanglewood, the home of Hawthorne and now the summer home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Here we heard an all-Haydn concert, as we lolled on the 210 acres of grounds which comprise Tanglewood. Among the Erie members of the orchestra is Robert A. Karlen of 1026 W. 31st St., who is a student choral conductor.

The orchestra performs in an out-of-door arrangement enclosed in a wood structure. So we might note that we heard Haydn from an orchestra that was "hidin'." At any rate, it was one of the most delightful and relaxing afternoons of our life.

Perhaps you wonder about the "room with the three pence"? There is an old New England tale to the effect that the inn-keepers used to leave three pence in their rooms to test the honesty of theiri guests, while still another old tale is to the effect that you leave three pennies in a room and make a wish that you may be there again.

And now, after a Saturday evening of delightful fashions, and a Sunday of sunshine, legend and music, and a real New England dinner at the antique-filled Red Lion Inn, we are en route back to New York City.

What is the old saying: "Wonderful New England, the home of the bean and the cod—where the Lowells speak only to the Cabots, and the Cabots speak only to God"? Well, we found, 'tain't so—everyone is friendly as can be in this traditionally beautiful part of America.

Fashion Writes Prelude To Tanglewood Tale

By Graydon Hearnsill
The Times Herald Fashion Editor

Stockbridge, Mass., July 23.—A new Tanglewood Tale has been written and a new chapter added to The Wonder Book.

One hundred and fifty fashion editors invaded this magnificent country of the Berkshires, made famous by Nathaniel Hawthorne, for a fabulous weekend in which fashion was the prelude for music. The setting was the unsurpassed panoramic beauty of pines, elms and white birches towering on hills and fringing lakes.

After New York's punishing pace, the fashion show aboard the New Haven and Hartford train (converted into a country club on wheels) was sugar-coated with leisure. The newspaperwomen relaxed with tall cold drinks (from a bar maintained by one of the hosts whose "honor roll" wines later teamed with spicy fresh air in whetting appetites for New England's renowned cooking).

Fashions on Train.

They sat back and watched models parade down the aisle in coats, suits and dresses that showed their affinity for travel and destination by switches in accessories. Or they strolled through the cars, pausing here for a facial and there for a hair-color bath "prescription" which would bring them the magic of a new personality or the highlighting of an old one in 20 short minutes—that's how long it took a brown-head to emerge as a flame. A display promised for next fall an exquisite silver pattern, the first modern sterling in which piercing actually makes the design rather than being an incidental element of the decoration. Another exhibit pointed out the distinctive characteristics of acetate and rayon; and still another featured the more covered-up and pointed silhouette in shoes.

That's truly the pleasant way to cover fashion and the related arts—just as the ideal way to listen to the great music is to stretch out on Tanglewood's sun-splashed lawn or prop, fanned by breezes, against the trunk of a giant elm.

From Lenox, the party went to nearby Eastover, famous resort in the heart of an area of impressive estates, and there, in the gardens of the Mansion, buffet tables groaned with everything from succulent lobsters and clam chowder to beans and berries. More fashions were shown under spotlights before the trip was continued by busses to Stockbridge, where Saturday night was spent in historic Red Lion Inn or old Heaton Hall.

Coffee After Church.

Sunday was no working day. The fashion editors, accustomed so that 7 o'clock hotel call to send them into New York's hectic schedule, rolled over in bed and slept late, arose for leisurely breakfasts, went to little steepled rock churches (where coffee is sipped and neighbors chat under trees on neat lawns after the services), and walked through the picturesque town that lives so closely with history plaques are still dedicated to George Washington instead of MacArthur and Eisenhower.

The Sunday concert of the Berkshire Festival (founded in 1934 and conducted for many years by the late Serge Koussevitzky) was played under the baton of Charles Munch. The newspaperwomen sat or stretched on the grass among 2,000 music lovers—old and young, rich and poor, from far and near—who listened in rapt silence, toddlers quiet as little church mice and women knitting with never a click from their flying needles. It's a unique and happy audience drawn to this mecca of music and beauty, and among it are the 358 students who come from all over the world to study under the masters at the Tanglewood summer music center. Texas, by the way, is represented on the roster by Blanche Birdsong, harp student from Longview.

Brilliant Brahms Program Brings Festival to Close

Munch Leads BSO in 2d and 4th Symphonies—Saturday Night Program Features Tchaikovsky's 'Pathetique'

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Charles Munch brought the 14th Berkshire Symphonic Festival at Tanglewood to a rousing close yesterday afternoon when he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Brahms fourth symphony. The all-Brahms program also included the variations on a theme by Haydn and the second symphony.

Munch kept the variations in a lovely lyric mood, never choosing the slower of two tempos when there was a choice, but always allowing the orchestra tone to be heard at its most beautiful. We have sometimes merely mentioned the performance of this classic or that novelty and accepted as static the tonal quality of the Boston orchestra. Yesterday the various sections, the strings, the reeds, the brass, even the percussion, distinguished themselves conspicuously in the many opportunities Brahms affords.

The second symphony moved along briskly but Munch kept the tone beautifully restrained and disciplined, but in the allegretto he overlooked the "ma non assai" of the ensuing presto and it took the startled orchestra a few bars to clarify a ragged start. On the whole Mr. Munch's tempi have been consistently on the fast side, a tendency which keeps the music vital and exciting while sacrificing some occasions for broader and grander expression. The final movements of both symphonies yesterday were cases in point. He whipped the orchestra up to vehemence and fury with only agitation the final result. There was more of the content available, but the huge audience was noisily elated and recalled the conductor time after time, with cumulative enthusiasm.

Saturday Concert

Saturday evening the Tchaikovsky "Pathetique" had been given an erratic reading. It was always vivid but it boiled up at certain points to bubbles of passion which were not always easy to explain. After opening with the Beethoven first symphony, Munch led the orchestra in the latest symphony by Arthur Honegger, his fifth, written only last December. Honegger was on the staff of the Berkshire Music Center three years ago and Koussevitzky commissioned a symphony work at that time.

The lush and extremely full polytonality of the opening statement had tonal glory which Mr. Munch allowed to be dissipated when the full resources of the orchestra were not called for. Honegger has a wonderful sense of orchestral sound and that alone was gratifying, but he also has musical ideas which retain one's interest. The middle movement has rhythmic fascination; the final one became an assault on one's ears by its unceasing full blare and glare.

The threat of rain yesterday afternoon undoubtedly affected attendance but the phenomenal crowd Saturday was gratifying for many reasons. Record-breaking crowds have come to be normal and we have rather lost our sense of proportion in that direction. When a record-breaking attendance of a previous year was not equaled, Jeremiahs sprung up with predictions and references to the Hollywood Bowl situation, etc. Thus the Saturday evening figures are more than a satisfying single event. They are evidence, if any is needed, that Tanglewood will flourish so long as its present policies are maintained.

Tanglewood Unique

Tanglewood is unique for many reasons. Contributory are the beautiful grounds and buildings, our fortuitous location, the internationally-renowned school; but the cardinal reason is the standard of the performances. We have a peerless orchestra, playing at its full and finest strength, under the leadership of internationally and justly famed leaders, never diluting the quality of their performances or the standards of their programs. By a happy mixture of the more familiar classics and a healthy quantity of newer and contemporary compositions, a criterion is set which is sagacious. The temptation to change has been strong; we hope it is resisted.

Mr. Munch deserved a special word of commendation and recognition. This was his first Tanglewood season, although he had conducted the orchestra two full seasons in Symphony Hall at Boston. In pre-Festival plans he was to assume a major share of the conducting assignments. With Koussevitzky's passing he stepped into additional responsibilities and fulfilled the tasks with eminent satisfaction. The best estimate of his stature can be gleaned from the program with which he closed the Festival yesterday afternoon. If anyone had been inclined to consider him solely as a French artist, he had only to listen to the Brahms Munch played. It showed him on the whole as an artist beyond national limitations and an individual of broad and inclusive scope.

Chas. Munch Is Conductor At Tanglewood

By D. E. RITZ

Charles Munch directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the [illegible]ed concerts at Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., on Thursday evening with the "Masonic-Funeral Music (K.477)" by Mozart as the opening number.

It was played in memory of Serge Koussevitzky, originator of the Tanglewood programs 13 seasons ago, and was received with a period of silence by the large audience. To the many who had learned to respect and admire Dr. Koussevitzky the occasion was made even more solemn through the realization that the day marked the 77th anniversary of his birth. Dr. Koussevitzky died June 4.

THE BALANCE of the program consisted of the Schumann "Symphony number [illegible] in D minor, opus 120" and the Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony, opus 14 A."

The Schumann Symphony, the most impressive offering of the evening for admirers of serious music, was presented with distinction. Its wonderful melodies with the embellishing figures as an integral part of the structure and contrasting moods of excitement brought the first half of the program to a close.

The Berlioz "Fantastic Symphony", is one of the compositions more often honored by lip service than by performance. A truly magnificent reading was given by the orchestra. Whether one was more intrigued by the lovely Waltz in the second movement, the subdued drum roll which so skillfully represented distant thunder in the third movement, the morbid "March to the Scaffold" or final "Dream of a Witches' Sabbath" would depend on the hearer's temperament or training. To this listener, the tolling bells used in the final movement formed a never-to-be-forgotten musical experience.

Boston Symphony Opens Tanglewood's 2d Week

LENOX, Mass., Aug. 2. — The second week end of Berkshire Festival concerts in the shed at Tanglewood opened tonight with a program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Charles Munch again conducting. In contrast to last week's opening concert of the season in the shed, tonight's event was favored with congenial, clear and cool weather.

The major work on the evening's list was Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, the Pastorale, which has special associations for those who have followed the progress of music here since the opening concerts on the Tanglewood estate in 1937. For it was at the first concert conducted by Serge Koussevitzky in the summer of that year that the Beethoven work was performed. A Berkshire Festival had been given the year before but not in Lenox.

The other works on tonight's program were Schumann's Overture to Genoveva, Ravel's Rapsodie Espagnole, and Roussel's Third Symphony.

The estimated attendance was well over 7,000 and many of the listeners heard the concert from the lawn behind the shed, sprawling on blankets which were also useful as protection from the cool evening air.

Tanglewood Audience Sets New Record

(Special to The Republican)

Lenox, Mass., July 9—Two all-Bach programs Sunday afternoon and Saturday night opened the 1951 summer concert series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Tanglewood.

A record-breaking 6,400 persons, 1,000 more than the number who attended last year's opening week end, saw Charles Munch make his debut as new music director for the Berkshire Festival. The French conductor [illegible] the Boston Symphony for two full seasons, but had never conducted at Tanglewood.

Saturday night, Mr. Munch dedicated the final chorus from "The Passion According to St. Matthew," to his predecessor, the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky. It is the first of a series of memorial concerts scheduled by the orchestra and by the Festival Chorus of the Berkshire Music Center, the symphony's school founded by Dr. Koussevitsky.

Mme. Koussevitsky slipped into a side seat in the little Theater-Concert Hall in time to hear Mr. Munch offer the choral selection to "the great leader, the great master, the creator of the Berkshire Music Center." The entire audience stood for a moment in silent tribute as the chorus finished.

The Festival Chorus, a student ensemble directed by Hugh Ross, almost took the spotlight from the orchestra in both opening performances. The powerful young voices were magnificent in the lusty music of "Der Zufriedengstellte Aeolus" (Aeolus Pacified), Bach's secular cantata. Soloists with the group were Phyllis Curtin, soprano; Eunice Alberts, contralto; David Lloyd, tenor and James Pease, bass.

Programs for the week end also included the Brandenburg Concerti Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 6, the Concerti in C major and D minor for three pianos and strings, and the choral "Magnificat," in D major. Trio pianists were Irving Fine, Ralph Berkowitz and Bernard Zighera.

Haydn and Mozart programs will be given over the next two week ends for the "little season" which precedes the major festival works by the full orchestra.

Festival Records Set As Season Winds Up

TANGLEWOOD—The 1951 edition of the Berkshire Festival came to a close yesterday in a blaze of broken attendance and box-office records as the concluding all-Brahms concert brought the curtain down on the biggest week end in Tanglewood's 14-year history.

44,000 Over Week End

Some 44,000 music lovers attended the Thursday-through-Sunday activities at the Festival, placing an unprecedented burden on Berkshire highways and on lodging facilities throughout the area.

On Saturday night—when a record total of 15,800 attended the concert—roads in the vicinity of the Shed were blocked by one of the worst traffic jams in Berkshire history. Because all available space in Tanglewood's normally adequate parking areas was filled, hundreds of music lovers were unable to get into the grounds until after the intermission.

All available lodging facilities in towns near the Festival were occupied early in the week end. Local information booths handled some of the biggest floods of inquiries in their history.

Public information booths in Lenox, Stockbridge, Lee, Great Barrington and Pittsfield reported a record number of inquiries from visitors seeking week-end lodging. Eugene E. Donnelly, manager of the Automobile Club of Berkshire County, said Saturday was "the toughest day we've had in 27 years."

Lodgings near the Festival were filled early. By Sunday the Auto Club and Chambers of Commerce were placing visitors in rooms throughout Lebanon Valley and as far north as Bennington, Vt.

While yesterday afternoon's attendance of 12,500 was no record-breaker, it was a remarkable turnout in view of the drizzling, gloomy weather. Although many of the 6500 who did not have seats in the Shed took refuge from the elements under the colonnade, many others sat under blankets or umbrellas on the soaked ground.

Receipts Total $249,000

Yesterday's finale—which marked the end of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 70th season—brought to a total of 126,700 the number of paid admissions during the current season at Tanglewood. This was a few thousand below the 1950 figure, but the 1951 total receipts of $249,000 were about $6000 over last year's.

Immediately after conducting yesterday's program, Mr. Munch left for New York, where he was scheduled to catch a plane for his home in Paris, but because of fog the flight was postponed until early this morning. He will remain in France until October, when he returns to this country to open the Boston Symphony's 1951-52 season.

During the past season of 45 weeks the orchestra played 212 concerts in 21 cities for 750,000 persons, in addition to those who heard the regular orchestra and the Boston Pops over the NBC network in 69 broadcasts.

Under Munch's direction for the second year, it performed works by 46 composers, not limiting its repertoire to the so-called old masterpieces. It averages two concerts every three days, in addition to the Pops broadcasts and "Dress Rehearsal" programs on NBC. Twenty-five new recorded works were released by RCA-Victor.

In addition to its home at Symphony Hall, Boston (one of the few halls owned outright by an orchestra) its Tanglewood property for the Berkshire Festival and Music Center, the only school with full facilities maintained by an orchestra, the Hatch Memorial Shell on the banks of the Charles

In the past season Mr. Munch inaugurated the opening of rehearsals at Symphony Hall once a month to students in the Greater Boston area at nominal prices, for the benefit of the pension fund. It was the 66th season of the Boston Pops, the 22d of the Esplanade, the ninth of the Berkshire Music Center and the 23d of association with the Victor Company in recording.

The director and 100-odd musicians will return from vacation in late September to rehearse for the concerts that will open Oct. 3. The regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts will be held in Boston with shorter series Tuesday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Forty-five concerts are planned outside of Boston on five tours to near-by cities in New England and New York, to Washington and a longer tour through the Midwest. The program includes an annual budget of a million and a half dollars.

Munch to Offer New Concerto By Foss Here Next Season

CHARLES MUNCH

Airs Tanglewood Symphony Plans

Charles Munch, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, on his arrival at Boston Airport yesterday from France, reported that he was bringing with him the composition of a Boston conductor to be played for the first time at the next symphony season.

Well Known Here

The composition, one of many new ones he heard and picked up in Italy, England and France for use here, is a piano concerto by Lukas Foss, who is now working and studying in Italy under a fellowship of the American Academy of Rome.

Foss, whom Munch characterized as having a great talent was well known here as a composer and director when the late Dr. Serge Koussevitzky appointed him official pianist of Boston Symphony.

Vacationing in Europe since early May, the French conductor cut short his visit on the death of Dr. Koussevitzky to return here to take full charge of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood, Lenox.

His first concert Saturday with the small chamber music group will be a memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky. He will conduct the funeral music of Mozart. Leonard Bernstein will conduct Beethoven's Missa Solemnis in a third memorial, August 9.

Munch's visit to Tanglewood will be the first since he visited the French composer, Arthur Honegger, there three years ago. He said he had many plans for the music festival but contemplates no changes.

"I hope to carry on in the same spirit as Dr. Koussevitzky," he said.

Concerning the discussion caused by his dropping the Sibelius Symphony from the Tanglewood program as originally scheduled by Dr. Koussevitzky, he explained that this would be the only change and that he planned to play it at the next symphony season.

A VITAL INSTITUTION

The Berkshire Music Center Continues The Work Begun by Koussevitzky

By OLIN DOWNES

IF there ever were exhibitions of the vitality of an idealistic institution founded by a man of genius whose inspiration put its imprint on everything that institution had done since it was started, even after the man himself has gone, it is the music school known as the Berkshire Music Center which Serge Koussevitzky established against all sorts of difficulties and confusions at Tanglewood.

This observation is based upon two performances, one a concert and one an opera, which the Berkshire Music Center gave last week at Tanglewood in Lenox in the Berkshires. The first concert was one in which representative products of each department of the school were to appear in a program devoted to Koussevitzky's memory. This affair was poorly organized and the performances were for the most part second-rate. The diversity of the products was interesting and has been recounted before this in THE NEW YORK TIMES. But the one performance which had the quality of which Koussevitzky had conceived was that of Lorin Maazel's direction of the performance by orchestra and chorus of Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms."

The rest of the concert gave the impression of much zeal, much enthusiasm, much team work of a sort by the participants, but that "sort" was more indicative of artistic enthusiasm than of finished accomplishment. It was a throw-off, as it were, of various teachers and their pupils—or shall we say disciples? — which, viewed in the large, bore testimony to the creative spirit engendered by this gathering of musicians at the Berkshire Festival; but it did not constitute an example of performances carefully prepared and finished to show the level of technical achievement by the students of a music school. The concert did something else. It bore testimony to the spirit of art and cooperative music making and music study on the higher levels which was Koussevitzky's fundamental purpose in founding this unique "school."

Tchaikovsky Opera

The performance of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," or rather the first of the two performances by the opera department, which were given on Monday and Tuesday evenings by two different casts, was a more astonishing exhibition, one more emphatic than ever of the purposes of this singularly vital and dauntless organization. Recall what Boris Goldovsky of the opera department, to put it graphically, was "up against" in this particular undertaking!

Koussevitzky had his heart set on a production of "Pique Dame," to be prepared, as regards chorus, soloists and stage business, by Goldovsky, and conducted by himself. This had been decided upon last May. The opera is no slight affair from the production standpoint alone. It requires seven different sets of scenery. Scenery and costumes of the opera's period were to be made by the opera school's workshop. The mis-en-scène, the action in detail, the musical coordination of the stage production, including the translation from the Russian — which means also the planning of all the vocal elements — was to be the task of Mr. Goldovsky and his colleagues. Suddenly and tragically, because of Koussevitzky's death, he was also entrusted with the direction of the ochestra.

It would have been simple and correct to have announced that because of the death of Koussevitzky, on the eve of the assembly of the school, this particularly difficult production would be abandoned. Apparently the idea never so much as entered the consciousness of those who had scheduled the event and who would be responsible for its success or failure. This was the opera that Koussevitzky wanted and that he had wished to direct, thus appearing for the first time in his career in America as a conductor of opera.

Apologia

Before the performance, given by invitation in the 1,200-seat theatre for Friends of the Berkshire Music Center, Mr. Goldovsky made from the stage a well-termed apologia for what might or might not happen, by reminding the audience that Koussevitzky was to have conducted the performance, which could not possibly reach the standard that he, baton in hand, would have established. In all humility, Mr. Goldovsky said, he and his colleagues would présent the opera to the best of their ability in his name.

The performance proceeded, with a number of long waits between scenes. It had its ups and downs, and no pun is intended. It had brilliant costumes, especially those of the military—officers being abundant in the plot—and some imaginative scenery, done in the modern economical manner of suggestion rather than abundance of apparatus or solidity of material. It had flavor and atmosphere. The orchestra was not well and subtly shaded, and was a little unwieldy under Mr. Goldovsky's stick. What could you expect?

This was his extra little chore, just to conduct that orchestra, which would have been the job of Serge Koussevitzky, on top of all the rest of the work of preparation. We are all for him, his courage, his resolve, which was of a piece with the spirit of Koussevitzky's school. Incredible as it may seem, the net effect of the opera, in spite of many deficiencies noted, was to project in some mysterious and contagious manner the underlying spirit of Tchaikovsky and make you say to yourself "What a remarkable opera it is!"

There is little question in our mind of the validity of a remark that Mr. Munch, conducting the symphonic concerts of the Berkshire Music Festival, made after first praising the festival itself, its facilities, accomplishments and all it stands for. He ended by saying: "The most important thing in the festival is the school." It has the heritage of the spirit of the man who made these symphonic festivals what they are today, and established the unique "academy," as he was wont to term it, to companion the achievements of the orchestra in a broad front which would advance, to the eternal credit of all, the highest interest of the musical art.

More power to their elbows!

Tanglewood—All American

Magic Of Music Center That Draws Thousands Visitors

BY LATIMER WATSON
Ledger-Enquirer Woman's Editor

NEW YORK, July 21 — The New Haven railroad waved a magic wand when it whisked the nation's fashion press from New York's torrid heat and plush elegance up and still higher up into the Berkshires, into the beauty and charm, the simplicity that is New England.

I've told you of the trip up, of Eastover high in the mountains near Lenox, Mass., where the leisurely grace of the "carriage era" is recaptured and where you feast on the most heavenly food; of our night at Heaton Hall, Fritz Kreisler's summer home, (no I did not see him), and of picturesque Red Lion Inn. The magnificence of their settings, high among the Berkshires, the old-world charm of historic Stockbridge, enthralled me. Nothing could be so beautiful.

That was before we reached Tanglewood and heard the Boston Symphony with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. Then all of it became only background for music, the most exquisite, the most lovely I have ever heard.

The concert was all Haydn with Charles Munch, successor to Tanglewood's beloved founder Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky, conducting.

Now those who know the Boston Symphony say they [redacted]rd that concert surpassed and not often equalled. There was the exquisite beauty of Haydn's Symphony No. 103 in E-Flat Major (The Drum Roll); Symphony No. 101 ("The Clock") and Symphony in G Major, "Oxford." Mr. Munch and his orchestra received the ovation they deserved and responded refreshingly— as if they'd never had applause and 'bravos' before.

Then there was Platigorsky! He played the Violincello Concerto in D Major. That was when I longed for Virginia Illges and all of you Three Arts Leaguers.

At Tanglewood Piatigorsky is in his element. He adores it and responds to the adoration given him with such music as you are rarely privileged to hear. This was his first and only scheduled appearance and the great audience went wild. The wooden musician who did his stint of playing, or so it seemed to me, on the Jordan platform, made a stiff bow and left the stage, wasn't even remotely related to the inspired artist who responded to the tumultous applause with all the abandon of a five-year-old at Christmas. As the applause mounted he embraced Mr. Munch, shook hands and patted the shoulder of the first violinist, gave the madly cheering audience the broadest of smiles, bowed and bowed again before he strode from the stage holding that cello high above his towering head. Then when he'd returned time and again, bowed over and over, thanked the orchestra, the audience, he strode from the platform for the last time wiping away tears that were coursing down his cheeks.

If the fates hadn't intervened and I hadn't been lucky enough to have a choice seat, the concert and Tanglewood would still remain the most movingly American experience I've ever had.

We entered the gates about noon to be met by a charming gentleman, Mr. Judd, the manager, who laughingly said he didn't want to talk like a guide so stop him if he got out of hand. Then he told us how Tanglewood came about. How it was in reality the drama of Dr. Koussevitsky, who believed music should be a part of the down - to - earth human pleasures of life. How this spot was chosen with its magnificent scenery an attraction in itself, as is its historic background. How it had been planned for the people, how they were invited to come to Tanglewood on picnics, spread their own lunches under the great elms, birch and pine trees, spend long afternoons lounging on the lawn, listening to the best music the world offers.

We, the hundred editors, came there as did thousands of others that beautiful Sunday. Came on a picnic. We wandered over the grounds, thrilled to the beauty of the great bowl, admired the Hawthorne hedges, the silvery "canoe" birch trees. We listened to the age-old stories of the countryside long before there was a Tanglewood. We went down to Hawthorne's tiny house where he wrote "Tanglewood Tales"; saw the quaint early American furnishings, their stark simplicity; had a wonderful picnic out under the trees with the sparkling sunshine warming the chill mountain air.

Then we walked toward the shell to find our places for the concert.

Seats in the auditorium are sold five years in advance, with only a few extras that are always taken early before the season opens. So we were to join the thousands who heard the concert from the lawn. The concert was at 3 o'clock. By 1:30 the lawn was dotted with groups of people. It was a colorful scene. Blankets, every color of the rainbow, were spread on the ground with groups lounging upon them. There were a few camp chairs. Others used the trunks of trees for backs. Literally thousands of people were scattered in groups about that lawn.

I spoke to one young couple seated on the fringe of the shell. They had been there since noon to get the place. the girl was reading Keats, the man a history of New England. It was from them I learned that only those who had seats in the auditorium could see the orchestra, that the others, all those thousands who dotted the lawn, would only hear. That there was no chance of getting tickets.

So I wandered off to find the best place. I wanted to see. Up to the side, off the platform, were a few hard benches. There were some vacant places. I found one among some young Italians who had driven up from New York, and would drive back after the concert. As I got my bearings I became curious about the ushers, so I went over to chat and found they were university students who had had in their applications for as many as three or four years; that their compensation was the privilege of hearing the music.

It was one of those boys who later sought me out to tell me a lady had offered me one of her seats. She was beautiful a marvellous afternoon together. She pointed out the celebrities to me; we wept together at the sheer beauty of the music; became fast, if passing, friends. She was Mrs. Charles Poore, wife of the New York Times book editor, and I'm eternally grateful to her for a memorable afternoon.

But I'd love to go again, to sit out on the lawn, hear the concert with all those young folks. (Did I tell you that it was the youngest of audiences?)

Not that I'd give up an opportunity to see as well as hear. But it is the most American sight imaginable. Every age, every class, was there. Young, old, rich, poor. Three Catholic sisters had come over from Albany. They do it every summer, they told me. Families had driven up in shabby cars; chauffeured limousines, some of them chromium sleek, others almost museum pieces. Bicycles were stacked against trees. In the distance were trucks. They'd come from all over the country, these folks, for a Sunday holiday of music.

Where else except in our America could you find such a scene?

Beethoven's 'Pastoral' At Tanglewood

Presented by Munch And Boston Symphony; Cold Hits Attendance

BY T. H. PARKER

Tanglewood, Lenox, Mass., Aug. 2.—(Special)—Now, the Berkshire Musical Festival is really the place to hear Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony.

They put you in the mood right away. Pulling into a parking lot of an old homestead opposite the festival grounds, this reviewer made small talk with the attendant, only to learn that the proprietor had fallen off a load of hay earlier this week and probably won't be up and around to the chores for another 10 days.

Other chitchat that might also go into this report is the weather. It was so cold up here this evening that mosquitos were stopping at the local gas stations to get their radiators filled with anti-freeze.

Attendance Light

Perhaps that was the reason why attendance in the big Berkshire Music Festival shed was so light. It would have been possible to stage "The Birth of a Nation" anywhere in the area I sat, without the cast stepping on any audience toes whatever.

But the fact is that to hear Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra play Beethoven's "Pastoral" here tonight was one of the few cheering things since the decline of the world situation. It has long been popular to look down the nose at the Sixth Symphony, as if it were pap for the children. And the truth is that this listener did sort of miss the flying horses from the Mobiloil stables that Walt Disney introduced in "Fantasia." Yet it is a heartwarming piece, full of friendliness, humanity and redolent of nature, and above all, its final section is a paen of hope and great, welling faith that few musical works can match, however toplofty their intent.

Not Overly Inspiring

Actually, less happy to report, Mr. Munch's reading of the symphony was not overly inspiring. He treated it with exceptional delicacy and subtlety, and the second movement was so fragmentary and retarded that the orchestra ensemble and the very music itself threatened to become unstuck. Mr. Munch has constantly shown himself one to make the showy most of any big, broad score. Somehow this was not true tonight, and the general effect, even in the storm and the last bit passages, was decidedly on the undernourished side, with nothing apple-cheeked about it.

Turgid Business

The program had opened with what was set down as the overture to "Genoveva" by Schumann. Mr. Munch expended great energies over it, but for the most part the music was a turgid business and hardly seemed worth the effort.

But out of the two last works, the Ravel Rapsodie Espagnole and Roussel's Third Symphony, conductor and orchestra made the big effort of the evening. Ravel is something that the good doctor Serge Koussevitzky had taught the Boston Symphony to play to a special turn, in virtuosity, in atmosphere, in all its fantasy aspects. The Rapsodie, composite of exquisite colors and perfumes, and then flamboyant fandangos, is a gaudy concoction, and it was as such that the Boston and Mr. Munch presented it, full of instrumental derring-do, all sound, some fury and perhaps not signifying too much.

The Roussel is the jaunty little Gallic item that either thrilled or chilled that memorable night with the honegger. It was the same ingeniously contrived and banally conceived work that kind of assumed banality that modern French composers do so well with tongue in cheek and hand on heart. Like the Ravel, it was dashingly played.

All in all, this was not a big night of Berkshire Music Festival concertizing, but it was a generally diverting one for all who could keep their minds off the chill enough to hear it above the chattering of their teeth.

7000 APPEAR AT ESPLANADE

Hear Opening Concert of 23rd Season

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An estimated 7000 people, one of whom was the Boston Symphony conductor, Charles Munch, attended last night's Esplanade concert, which opened the 23rd season of these musical evenings on the Charles River Embankment. That more people did not come may be because until late afternoon there was every reason to expect that the day's rainy conditions would continue into the night. Those who did come can be largely set down as optimists and opportunists.

It used to be said that Arthur Fiedler had a standing arrangement with the weatherman, but of late he has enjoyed keeping conductor, orchestra and prospective listeners on edge. However, once the weather cleared, the concert proceeded without incident.

The musical program emphasized the similarity that now exists between the Esplanade concerts and the Pops. In short, more substantial numbers came first and less weighty ones in the second half. For the former, Mr. Fiedler offered Berlioz's "Rakoczy" March, the Rameau-Mottl Ballet Suite, the Andante Cantabile from Tchaikovsky's String Quartet, Opus 11, and the "Rienzi" Overture of Wagner. After intermission the orchestra played Josef Strauss' "Music of the Spheres," Gade's "Jealousy," a selection from Berlin's "Call Me Madam" and Gould's "American Salute."

The program announced the benefit concert to be held in Fenway Park on the evening of July 11, but during intermission Fire Commissioner Kelleher, who had been instrumental in organizing this affair, had to convey to the audience the sad tidings that it had been postponed, since the various stars, whose appearance had been counted on, had proved to be unavailable.

Dr. Munch to Introduce His Concerto Here

An original concerto written in France by Lukas Foss, 29, who formerly lived and studied music composition in a Huntington ave., flat near Symphony Hall, will be personally introduced by Dr. Charles Munch next season as he directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Munch, who arrived at Logan International Airport yesterday after a two-month tour of France and Italy, said that he was first attracted to Foss' concerto in Paris when he heard it on a radio program.

Dr. Munch said that he plans to play several symphonies at Tanglewood in memory of Dr. Koussevitsky. Among them will be the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion, Mozart funeral music and Missa Solemnis.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

PITTSFIELD, July 26 — Had fate not ordained otherwise, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky would have conducted tonight's opening concert of the current Berkshire festival on his 77th birthday.

As it was, the concert was directed by his successor in Boston, Charles Munch, who was making his first appearance in the Tanglewood Music Shed, though he had conducted the six preliminary concerts, devoted to the music of Bach, Mozart and Haydn in the smaller auditorium.

In this Berkshire festival the late and greatly beloved conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is being extensively memorialized. A chorus from Bach served that purpose in the opening concert of the preliminary series and last night's concert, which opened the festival-proper, began with Mozart's seldom heard but deeply impressive Masonic funeral music.

Tomorrow night there will be a student concert in memory of Koussevitzky. On Monday and Tuesday evenings of next week the performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," which he was to have conducted, will be given in his memory and a final tribute will come when Leonard Bernstein conducts Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Aug. 9.

Stand in Silent Tribute

It may be partly a matter of tonality, but this funeral music of Mozart seems to look ahead to the funeral march in Beethoven's "Erocia" and to the long C Minor passagef or orchestra in the last division of Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

Before conducting the music, Mr. Munch asked the audience to refrain from applause but to stand instead for a few moments at the end in silent tribute.

These rites accomplished, Mr. Munch turned his attention to two romantic symphonies in which he has been notably successful in Boston and elsewhere: the Fourth of Schumann and the Fantastic of Berlioz. Mr. Munch's way with the Schumann is admittedly unorthodox, yet it is possible to find his version of the music highly persuasive.

Audience Enthusiastic

It is ardent, passionate, propulsive, with relieving moments of tenderness. And any performance of this symphony that makes you feel like cheering at the end must in the very nature of things be exceptional.

The audience last evening, once applause was permitted it, was highly enthusiastic. It was not what you would call a popular program, and perhaps a thousand of the 6500 seats in the shed went unoccupied, though some 2000 heard the concert on the grounds without.

It might be mentioned that Koussevitzkys widow sat in her usual place.

The weather, after a hot day, was quite ideal, neither too warm nor too cool.

Cellist Steals Performance At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 16 —The works of Joseph Haydn, represented by four symphonies, a sinfonie concertante for winds and strings, the D major Piano Concerto and a superb interpretation of the violoncello Concerto in D major, were offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end.

The all-Haydn programs followed last week's Bach concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall. Next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon the orchestra will devote itself to music by Mozart, in the third week-end of "Little" concerts opening the 11th year of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

Gregor Piatigorsky, a rollicking, exuberant giant who came onstage swinging his cello as if it were a violin, was soloist yesterday. He drew an unprecedented burst of applause from the audience after the sustained solo passage by the cello in the exposition of the concerto, and from there on, set his own pace for Charles Munch and the orchestra to follow.

Piano soloist for Saturday night's concert was Seymour Lipkin, 24-year-old New Yorker who is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. His playing of the three-part concerto was brilliant, particularly moving in the tender, meloci second movement.

Of the four symponies offered, No. 88, No. 104 ("London,") No. 103 ("The Drum Roll,") and No. 101 ("The Clock,") the 88th was perhaps the warmest, although the tempo of the opening two movements seemed a trifle too restrained by comparison with the full, robust treatment of its minuet and final.

Visitors to Tanglewood will often find that some of the most stimulating music comes not from the professional perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but from the numberless student groups whose recitals are open to supporting members, "Friends," of the Music Center. Yesterday morning, young musicians of the orchestral department gave a program of chamber music in the open-sided Chamber Music Hall. Opera Department students list a program for tomorrow night, the student orchestra gives a Shed concert Friday, while another chamber music recital will again be given Sunday morning.

Skirts, Not Slacks, Edict At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 2. (AP) — Tanglewood officials would "prefer" that ladies wear skirts to the famous summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But more and more of the female music lovers have been showing up in slacks or shorts.

He will have ushers hand out wrap-around skirts to the informally clad visitors.

Right now there are only eight wraparounds and they will go on a first come-first served basis.

Perry said the skirts come in only two sizes: large and medium

It has long been popular to look down the nose at the Sixth Symphony, as if it were pap for the children. And the truth is that this listener did sort of miss the flying horses from the Mobiloil stables that Walt Disney introduced in "Fantasia." Yet it is a heartwarming piece, full of friendliness, humanity and redolent of nature, and above all, its final section is a paen of hope and great, welling faith that few musical works can match, however top-lofty their intent.

Not Overly Inspiring

Actually, less happy to report, Mr. Munch's reading of the symphony was not overly inspiring. He treated it with exceptional delicacy and subtlety, and the second movement was so fragmentary and retarded that the orchestra ensemble and the very music itself threatened to become unstuck. Mr. Munch has constantly shown himself one to make the show most of any big, broad score. Somehow this was not true tonight, and the general effect, even in the storm and the last bit passages, was decidedly on the undernourished side, with nothing applecheeked about it.

Turgid Business

The program had opened with what was set down as the overture to "Genoveva" by Schumann. Mr. Munch expended great energies over it, but for the most part the music was a turgid business and hardly seemed worth the effort.

But out of the two last works, the Ravel Rapsodie Espagnole and Roussel's Third Symphony, conductor and orchestra made the big effort of the evening. Ravel is something that the good doctor Serge Koussevitzky had taught the Boston Symphony to play to a special turn, in virtuosity, in atmosphere, in all its fantasy aspects. The Rapsodie, composite of exquisite colors and perfumes, and then flamboyant fandangos, is a gaudy concoction, and it was as such that the Boston and Mr Munch presented it, full of instrumental derring-do, all sound, some fury and perhaps not signifying too much.

The Roussel is the jaunty little Gallic item that either thrilled or chilled that memorable night with the honegger. It was the same ingeniously contrived and banally conceived work that kind of assumed banality that modern French composers do so well with tongue in cheek and hand on heart. Like the Ravel, it was dashingly played.

All in all, this was not a big night of Berkshire Music Festival concertizing, but it was a generally diverting one for all who could keep their minds off the chill enough to hear it above the chattering of their teeth.

7000 APPEAR AT ESPLANADE

Hear Opening Concert of 23rd Season

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

An estimated 7000 people, one of whom was the Boston Symphony conductor, Charles Munch, attended last night's Esplanade concert, which opened the 23rd season of these musical evenings on the Charles River Embankment. That more people did not come may be because until late afternoon there was every reason to expect that the day's rainy conditions would continue into the night. Those who did come can be largely set down as optimists and opportunists.

It used to be said that Arthur Fiedler had a standing arrangement with the weatherman, but of late he has enjoyed keeping conductor, orchestra and prospective listeners on edge. However, once the weather cleared, the concert proceeded without incident.

The musical program emphasized the similarity that now exists between the Esplanade concerts and the Pops. In short, more substantial numbers came first and less weighty ones in the second half. For the former, Mr. Fiedler offered Berlioz's "Rakoczy" March, the Rameau-Mottl Ballet Suite, the Andante Cantabile from Tchaikovsky's String Quartet, Opus 11, and the "Rienzi" Overture of Wagner. After intermission the orchestra played Josef Strauss' "Music of the Spheres," Gade's "Jealousy," a selection from Berlin's "Call Me Madam" and Gould's "American Salute."

The program announced the benefit concert to be held in Fenway Park on the evening of July 11, but during intermission Fire Commissioner Kelleher, who had been instrumental in organizing this affair, had to convey to the audience the sad tidings that it had been postponed, since the various stars, whose appearance had been counted on, had proved to be unavailable.

LAUDS MUSIC OF EX-HUB MAN

Dr. Munch to Introduce His Concerto Here

An original concerto written in France by Lukas Foss, 29, who formerly lived and studied music composition in a Huntington ave., flat near Symphony Hall, will be personally introduced by Dr. Charles Munch next season as he directs the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Munch, who arrived at Logan International Airport yesterday after a two-month tour of France and Italy, said that he was first attracted to Foss' concerto in Paris when he heard it on a radio program.

Dr. Munch said that he plans to play several symphonies at Tanglewood in memory of Dr. Koussevitsky. Among them will be the final chorus from the St. Matthew Passion, Mozart funeral music and Missa Solemnis.

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

PITTSFIELD, July 26 — Had fate not ordained otherwise, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky would have conducted tonight's opening concert of the current Berkshire festival on his 77th birthday.

As it was, the concert was directed by his successor in Boston, Charles Munch, who was making his first appearance in the Tanglewood Music Shed, though he had conducted the six preliminary concerts, devoted to the music of Bach, Mozart and Haydn in the smaller auditorium.

In this Berkshire festival the late and greatly beloved conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is being extensively memorialized. A chorus from Bach served that purpose in the opening concert of the preliminary series and last night's concert, which opened the festival-proper, began with Mozart's seldom heard but deeply impressive Masonic funeral music.

Tomorrow night there will be a student concert in memory of Koussevitzky. On Monday and Tuesday evenings of next week the performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame," which he was to have conducted, will be given in his memory and a final tribute will come when Leonard Bernstein conducts Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" on Aug. 9.

Stand in Silent Tribute

It may be partly a matter of tonality, but this funeral music of Mozart seems to look ahead to the funeral march in Beethoven's "Eroica" and to the long C Minor passage for orchestra in the last division of Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

Before conducting the music, Mr. Munch asked the audience to refrain from applause but to stand instead for a few moments at the end in silent tribute.

These rites accomplished, Mr. Munch turned his attention to two romantic symphonies in which he has been notably successful in Boston and elsewhere: the Fourth of Schumann and the Fantastic of Berlioz. Mr. Munch's way with the Schumann is admittedly unorthodox, yet it is possible to find his version of the music highly persuasive.

Audience Enthusiastic

It is ardent, passionate, propulsive, with relieving moments of tenderness. And any performance of this symphony that makes you feel like cheering at the end must in the very nature of things be exceptional.

The audience last evening, once applause was permitted it, was highly enthusiastic. It was not what you would call a popular program, and perhaps a thousand of the 6500 seats in the shed went unoccupied, though some 2000 heard the concert on the grounds without.

It might be mentioned that Koussevitzkys widow sat in her usual place.

The weather, after a hot day, was quite ideal, neither too warm nor too cool.

Cellist Steals Performance At Tanglewood

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 16 —The works of Joseph Haydn, represented by four symphonies, a sinfonie concertante for winds and strings, the D major Piano Concerto and a superb interpretation of the violoncello Concerto in D major, were offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week end.

The all-Haydn programs followed last week's Bach concerts in the Theater-Concert Hall. Next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon the orchestra will devote itself to music by Mozart, in the third week-end of "Little" concerts opening the 11th year of the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood.

Gregor Piatigorsky, a rollicking, exuberant giant who came onstage swinging his cello as if it were a violin, was soloist yesterday. He drew an unprecedented burst of applause from the audience after the sustained solo passage by the cello in the exposition of the concerto, and from there on, set his own pace for Charles Munch and the orchestra to follow.

Piano soloist for Saturday night's concert was Seymour Lipkin, 24-year-old New Yorker who is on the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center. His playing of the three-part concerto was brilliant, particularly moving in the tender, meloci second movement.

Of the four symponies offered, No. 88, No. 104 ("London,") No. 103 ("The Drum Roll,") and No. 101 ("The Clock,") the 88th was perhaps the warmest, although the tempo of the opening two movements seemed a trifle too restrained by comparison with the full, robust treatment of its minuet and final.

Visitors to Tanglewood will often find that some of the most stimulating music comes not from the professional perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but from the numberless student groups whose recitals are open to supporting members, "Friends," of the Music Center. Yesterday morning, young musicians of the orchestral department gave a program of chamber music in the open-sided Chamber Music Hall. Opera Department students list a program for tomorrow night, the student orchestra gives a Shed concert Friday, while another chamber music recital will again be given Sunday morning.

Skirts, Not Slacks, Edict At Tanglewood

Lenox, Mass., Aug. 2. (AP) — Tanglewood officials would "prefer" that ladies wear skirts to the famous summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But more and more of the female music lovers have been showing up in slacks or shorts.

Thomas B. Perry, jr., executive secretary of the Berkshire music festival, plans tonight "to give guests a chance to conform to the desired uniform."

He will have ushers hand out wrap-around skirts to the informally clad visitors.

After all, Perry said, women students have long been required to wear skirts at the noted summer school taught by Boston Symphony Orchetra artists.

Right now there are only eight wraparounds and they will go on a first come-first served basis.

Perry said the skirts come in only two sizes: large and medium

Munch Does Swell by Berkshire Music

By ROBERT BAGAR.

LENOX, Mass., July 30.—Under the direction of Charles Munch, the first weekend of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival offered two programs, one on Saturday evening, the other yesterday afternoon, both containing familiar music, and both attended by sizable audiences.

Mr. Munch began proceedings on Saturday with the overture to Weber's "Oberon," which went fluidly and, for the majority taste, pleasantly. He then took up the Russian modernist Serge Prokofiev, whose Sixth Symphony E-flat minor, Op. 111 is a piece of absolute music, more or less. For Prokofiev endows it with no more literary benisons than what is contained in the following words of his: "The first movement is agitated in character, lyrical in places and austere in others. The second movement, andante, is lighter and more songful. The finale, lighter and major in its character, would be like the finale of my Fifth Symphony, but for the austere reminiscences of the first movement."

Good Symphony.

And there you have it, the music emerges, or emerged, in just such a fashion as Prokofiev depicts. It is a rather good symphony, not too crowded with dissonance, not too arresting, but a work well tailored and of unimpeded flow. Mr. Munch, obviously fond of it, conducted expertly, with the esprit wanted by the music and always with refinement.

The evening attained its chief all-around perfection with the performance of the Brahms second Piano Concerto, with Claudio Arrau to play the solo part.

Mr. Arrau, not content with giving a Lewisohn Stadium audience quite a turn with his pianistic discourse of the First Brahms Concerto, one recent evening, doubled in generosity with as smooth and expressive and communicative a rendering of the Second up here at Tanglewood.

Takes the Honors.

True, the orchestra support provided by Mr. Munch and the Boston Symphony contributed a good deal to the effectiveness of the reading, but it was Mr. Arrau's super-elegant, delightfully liquid pianistics that really took the important honors.

The high-water mark of the whole symphonic weekend came yesterday with the Boston Symphony's performance of four works, two modern and two standard. Charles Munch again conducted.

For constant technical, as well as executive brilliance, yesterday's program far surpassed the previous ones, as a whole, that is. Offering such music as the Samuel Barber Overture, "The School for Scandal," Aaron Copland's "Quiet City," the Schubert Fourth Symphony and Cesar Franck's D minor Symphony, the orchestra and the conductor provided miracles of choir balance, delicacy of phrasing, polish all over and, what's most interesting, renderings that were highly intelligent, while neglecting none of the duly required obeisances to romanticism in the last two works.

Orchestral Lucidity.

Barber's sprightly, jocuse and youthful overture came off, right at the start of proceedings, with a gratifying orchestral lucidity. The Copland piece, which I now particularly treasure—after some seasons of doubtful response to it—came through with all of its evocative, multifaceted beauty.

Of the four movements in the Schubert I have always been most partial to the last. The work's "Tragic" subtitle always comes as a surprise to me, since I find little in it that could be interpreted. Anyway, the last movement, as delivered by Mr. Munch and his cohorts was a textbook on orchestral clarity, purity in speed, and sensitiveness.

But the Franck Symphony, so sympathetically expressed by Mr. Munch—as we New Yorkers are aware—brought a proper climax to the musical doings of this first series. A moving, colorful pattern of sound, rich in melodic and harmonic invention was a pure joy all through, was a pure joy all through. And that is the story for now.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

At The Shed, Tanglewood, last evening, Charles Munch conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opening concert of the full orchestra series: the program follows:

Masonic Funeral Music (K477) in memorial of Serge Koussevitzky — Mozart
Symphony No. 4 in D minor — Schubmann
Fantastic Symphony — Berlioz

By ELINOR HUGHES

LENOX, July 26— On an evening as beautiful as only the Berkshires can produce in late July, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Charles Munch, opened the first series of full orchestral concerts in the shed. The audience was very large—if not entirely capacity—the applause was enormous, and the occasion was one of very great generaal satisfaction.

That there was more than a suggestion of looking backward as well as looking forward to the proceedings was only natural, for this is the first year that Serge Koussevitzky's dynamic presence has been missing, a thought present in the minds of the listeners and enforced by the playing, as the opening number on the program, of Mozart's Masonic funeral music as a memorial tribute to the man whose vision and unrelenting labor made Tanglewood a reality and not just a beautiful dream. One man conceived it, but the music world has now taken it to their hearts.

Reports on the success of the season so far are really exciting. The series of chamber music concerts in the preceding weeks of July were entirely sold out, and there is the accustomed rush for seats for the subsequent Shed concerts, which continue through this week, next week and the week after. Tonight's attnedance totalled about 5000 in the Shed itself and 2000 in admissions besides. The only thing that was lacking for complete satisfaction was a full moon, but even for tanglewood, the lunar calendar couldn't be juggled with.

Present in the audience were many distinguished musicians and music lovers from Boston, New York and elsewhere. Including Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, the French ambassador and his wife. Madame Koussevitzky honored the occasion with her presence, so that her's and her husband's many friends could feel that Serge Koussevitzy was here in spirit if not in visible presence.

The program following the Mozart Masonic funeral music—at the end of which the audience and the orchestra rose and stood for a moment in silence—consisted of Schumann's Symphony No. 4 and Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony. The Schumann was played with unusual fire and brilliance, as though Mr. Munch and the orchestra were more than ordinarily inspired in their interpretation of a work that can sometimes be rather less than inspiring.

As it was, the music seemed charged with melodic beauty and soring imagination, the composer's inspiration, like the poet's eye, Rolling forth in a fine frenzy. The Berlioz, grandiose, romantic, packed with tonal images and expansive orchestration, brought the evening to a truly exciting close. That ovations for Mr. Munch and the orchestra followed both symphonies, is hardly to be wondered at—they were richly deserved.

Mr. Munch will conduct the second program of series A, tomorrow night. This will consist of Weber's overture to "Oberon," Prokofieff's Symphony No. 6 in E flat minor and Brahams' piano concerto in B flat major, with Claudio Arrau as soloist.

Our Editha Visits Hawthorne Area; Thrilled by Symphony

BY EDITHA K. WEBSTER
Journal Woman's Editor

NEW YORK.

Dear Fellows: The little red house where Nathanial Hawthorne lived dots a landscape of misty blue Berkshires and great woods, overlooking a valley with a rippling brook in the foreground and a lake, framed by mountains, in the distance.

Here, where Hawthorne's Tanglewood tales are said to have first been told, is the summer festival scene of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and picknickers, music lovers, students and tourists throng.

We were among them yesterday afternoon, lunching under the trees from caterer's boxes with this panorama of beauty spread before us and listening later to the Haydn Festival concert of the symphony, Gregor Piotogorsky, cellist, was soloist.

At Tanglewood, a concert is music which encompasses the out-of-doors as well as the auditorium. The audience sits on benches; lies on the ground—and folks near us literally took off their shoes and wriggled their toes in the long grass beside their blanket while the birds overhead joined the music, always in pitch, never discordant.

Charles Munch, who conducted, is an artist of easy dignity, whose assured performance was completely free from ostentation. And the music, itself, was of unforgettable quality and grace.

Sitting out-of-doors with a view of the performers' entrance—and they tuned outside and smoked there during intermission—I witnessed the departure of Mr. Piotogorsky. His instrument under his arm, he came out informally dressed, quite soon after his solo number. Waiting were two young persons and a woman, who were, I'm guessing, his wife and children, and whom he tucked with the instrument into a car. In the best of commuter fashion, the cellist relaxed in the front seat, while his feminine companion quietly backed, turned and drove away. Students had pressed for autographs, receiving friendly, leisurely greetings beforehand.

Our entertainment was at noted inns, Heaton Hall and the Red Lion, Stockbridge, Mass., and Eastover, where on arrival Saturday evening we enjoyed an elaborate dinner on the lawn. Probably the most appetizing buffet I've ever seen was spread on the broad veranda of the recreation center. There was a New England dinner, complete from clam chowder and on through one's choice of lobster, beef and cabbage, beans and innumerable other vegetables and deep dish pies and puddings. They steamed from a tiered table on one side. Bountiful meats, salads and fruits were handsomely arranged on the other.

From our lawn chairs w viewed a comprehensive showin of fashions. But of them I wi have to write write later. Bell boys are outside for this type writer and my luggage; I'm o for South Pacific, which I'v missed to date, then to Connecti cut for an overnight stay en rout to East Hampton, L. I. There week's vacation is scheduled, aft er which I'll be seeing you Happy days!

7,000 Enjoy Tanglewood Shed Festival

(Special to The American)

Lenox, Mass., July 27—Diplomatic and musical notables attracted almost as much attention as did the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, at the first of the Berkshire Music Festival's major summer concerts in the vast Tanglewood Shed.

It was more than merely a celebrity-studded opening night, however, for an audience of more than 7,000 heard a stirring performance of the imaginative, "Fantastic Symphony" by Berlioz, long to be remembered by admirers of Charles Munch, new conductor of the orchestra. The violent contrasts in the Berlioz music were heightened by Mr. Munch's orchestration, which brought out all the color, fire and grisly humor of this symphony.

Dedicated To Founder

The program, first in a series of nine Festival concerts for the full Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened with the resonant Masonic Funeral Music by Mozart. Dedicating this to the late Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, founder of the Berkshire Music Center and conductor of the orchestra for a quarter-century, Mr. Munch asked the listeners not to applaud, but to stand in tribute at the finish of the number. Yesterday would have been Dr. Koussevitsky's 77th birthday.

Also played last night was Schuman's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, a vigorous, melodic composition which the took the orchestra in swift transition from sensitive airs for strings to the brassy insistance of a triumphant finale.

Last night's audience included Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt; the French ambassador, Henri Bonnet, and his stately wife; Mme. Koussevitsky, dramatically clad in a long black cape; and the young composer-conductor, Leonard Bernstein, long a protege of Dr. Koussevitsky, who now directs the Music Center School.

Editha Shows New Yorkers How to Get Theater Tickets

BY EDITHA K. WEBSTER
Journal Woman's Editor

NEW YORK.

Dear Fellows: Here "it's a lovely day" to write the reprise of Call Me Madam, which I played truant to see last night. I achieved it following a discouraging barrage of "Impossible!" from friends at a penthouse supper party at Central Park West and the overall sneer of staff members at a Broadway theater ticket agency. After which I employed the simple expedient of walking up to the boxoffice of the Imperial theater, requesting a ticket and purchasing it. And I wasn't even in a hurry about it, and it was an excellent seat in addition.

It's a lovely day here in New York two ways. First, cool and sunny because this afternoon we're off to the Berkshires for a weekend at Tanglewood, where tomorrow afternoon we expect to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Piatorgsky as soloist. We're to be entertained there until midnight Sunday. A special train on the New Haven railroad takes us from Grand Central an hour and a half from now, returning us, too. Tanglewood is a place of which I've read much, never expecting to visit it.

Hawthorne's Quiet Tanglewood Blossoms Into Riot Of Life As Fashion Writers Gather

By IDA CLEMENS
Fashions Editor

SURELY you remember Nathaniel Hawthorne's "Tanglewood Tales." Well, I have a tale to tell about Tanglewood that would make Hawthorne turn over in his grave.

After one of the hottest and most hectic weeks in New York getting the inside dope on the coming Fall fashions, more than 100 fashion writers were whisked from Manhattan for a fabulous week end in the beautiful Berkshire Hills.

Our ultimate destination was Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass. Tanglewood, once filled with literary associations, is now the home of the Berkshire Festivel concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But first . . .

The fashion sleuths boarded a special six-car train and right off a conductor gasped, "The New York, New Haven & Hartford never saw anything like this before."

And you've never seen a fashion show staged under difficulties until you've watched models jouncing from seat to seat, expounding Varden's fashions for women five feet five inches or less. . . . . Bellciano's wishbone silhouette. . . . . Marvella's cabachon scatter pins, a promotion of felt for shoes by Merrimac, makers of felt hat bodies . . . and a dozen or so other new fashion ideas.

Beauty For Writers

It was as difficult for me as for the models to concentrate on clothes on the train. But the big fashion show was yet to come. Meanwhile, most popular spot on the Tanglewood special was the Tussy beauty bar. Here, the weary working press got their second wind with the addition of a new face. Isn't it wonderful, girls, what makeup can do for you?

Somewhere along the trail, Robert Bellsey of Bellciano explained his wishbone silhouette. It's wide at the shoulders and bosom, whittled at the waist, rounded at the hips and slim at the hem.

The sun was setting as we arrived at Lenox where buses took the girls to Eastover for a bountedus buffet dinner a la New England. Don't tell anybody but I consumed two lobsters before I could concentrate on the fashion show staged on a sweep of green lawn.

Sitting on the terrace with a temperature of (oh, I don't want to make you sweltering Memphians feel bad), I noted especially a full flaring coat by Bellciano in a deep-piled royal fabric in royal purple. It was fastened with a black snakeskin dog collar and buttons.

Tweed Skirt For School

Nelly De Grab showed a wonderful back-to-school outfit of vibrant tweed skirt and russet velveteen blouse. Another sweetheart of a costume for a school girl consisted of a picture-frame neckline blouse of navy jersey, mated with a slim navy jersey skirt. For evening glamour, you tie on a gold printed navy taffeta apron.

For year-round wear, Hannah Troy designed a silk suit of Skinner ottoman, collared and cuffed in deep, polished satin. Skinner's featherweight faille was perfect for Adele Simpson's coat dress with the new full skirt and push-up sleeves.

Was it on the train or at Eastover that I jotted down Varden Petite's slender one-piece dress of charcoal gray wool with paneled skirt? Anyway, its adjustable collar and cuffs are accented with red and gray striped taffeta. A wonderful dress anywhere.

All costumes were accessorized with Hanes hosiery, Aris gloves, Palter DeLiso shoes and jewelry by Marvella. We also saw the newest hair color by Clairol called "flame."

Before the showing started, a beauteous blond model submitted to a shampoo and a dousing with the hair coloring.

Before it was over, she was back and I must say—if you feel the male populace is passing you by, have a fling at flaming your tresses. But don't blame me for the consequences.

MidSouthemers Up There

Glutted with the finest of New England's dishes and the fairest of Fall fashions, the press finally took to bed (beneath blankets) at the historic Red Lion Inn in nearby Stockbridge.

The next morning after a leisurely breakfast, special buses carted the fashion crew through a breath-taking countryside to Tanglewood. Here the girls oh'd and ah'd at the scenic beauty of spreading trees, velvety lawns and the Berkshire Hills for magnificent backdrop.

Here, I learned that among the 356 students at the Berkshire Music Center were Roslind Lang of Hot Springs, Ark., Russell (Dudley) Patterson of Jackson, Miss., Leontyne M. Price of Laurel, Miss.

Tried to find them but couldn't. I did find the "little red house" where Hawthorne lived, wrote "The House of Seven Gables" and invented his "Tanglewood Tales."

Now it was time for the concert, climax of this fabulous fashion junket. And I've never seen such an impressive sight in my life. Sitting, sprawled or standing on the grass were at least 2000 people.

As the first note sounded, the huge crowd hushed every murmur. Not a thing stirred except the wind in the hemlocks. The sole noise was the occasional twitter of a bird. That lasted throughout the entire concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on this occasion devoted to Haydn with the renowned cellist, Piatigorsky, as the soloist.

Then back to the Red Lion Inn for a hot "sitting down dinner" before the return train trip to Manhattan. The whole thing was an exciting and stimulating stunt to put over the Fall fashion story for the edification of the fashion press and their newspaper readers.

There were many other displays and shows, particularly a new sterling silver pattern by Reed & Barton. But I've run out of space and words. These will be described when I catch my breath.

TASTES HAVE CHANGED
A Night at Tanglewood

By ELEANOR ROOSEVELT

HYDE PARK—On Thursday evening Miss Thompson and I went with Mrs. Auerback from Hartford to the Berkshire Music Festival at Tanglewood. It was a beautiful concert, but every one, I think, felt a little sad, because our thoughts turned to Serge Koussevitzky, who died on June 4, 1951. This festival was his inspiration, as was the music school and all that is done at Tanglewood.

The conductor was Charles Munch and he began the concert by playing Mozart's Masonic funeral music, asking us beforehand not to applaud, but to rise and stand at the end in memory of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky's wife came in just before the concert began and I could not help thinking what a difficult and emotional night this must have been for her. The music was beautifully rendered by the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra and nothing could have been more fitting than this tribute to the memory of a great conductor.

Then the orchestra played Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor, and after the intermission Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

The French Ambassador and Madame Bonnet were there to enjoy the really beautiful rendition by the orchestra. They had come from Detroit and hoped to go for a week's holiday in Seal Harbor, Me., but Madame Bonnet was none too sure that her husband could get six days of rest and change.

I hope the Berkshire Festival will continue to be upheld by the public because it is a fitting memorial to Dr. Koussevitzky and one that the public should continue to appreciate and support in every way possible.

Before going to the concert we dined at Elm Court, which has become an inn and restaurant. They pointed out to me the elm under which Harry White, President Woodrow Wilson and others must have discussed terms of the World War I peace treaty. I could not help thinking how much an old house could tell if only the walls and furniture could talk.

Evidently many of the furnishings and pictures were left in this house when it was sold. The grounds are the real beauty, and they have been fortunate, for their elms seem to have remained untouched by the beetle.

Taste has changed greatly since these houses of rich people were built. On the whole, I think taste has improved. There is more simplicity today regardless of the money you may have to spend. Perhaps there is less money to spend, too, and I am not sure that is not a good thing if it drives us to more study of real beauty of line and simplicity as well as better use of our space.

Munch's Two Fine Concerts

By MILES KASTENDIECK

TANGLEWOOD, Lenox, Mass., July 30.—Charles Munch came into his own during this past Berkshire Festival weekend. Conducting both Saturday and Sunday concerts, he revealed how fine a musician he is, how versatile his repertory, and how vital his performances.

In the face of dubious weather conditions, some 18,500 people attended and responded most enthusiastically.

Contemporary music helped balance both programs. A discerning interpretation of Prokofieff's Sixth Symphony on Saturday night spoke well for Prokofieff as well as for Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In their austerity, the first two movements yield their secret more slowly than the more pliable finale which is characteristic Prokofieff.

Munch appeared singularly aware of the musical fabric though perhaps not yet wholly in full possession of the secret of the entire work. The performance absorbed the audience's attention.

American music opened yesterday's program. Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal" and Copland's "Quiet City" were favored with superb performances. The Barber score—crisp, chattering, and bright—has seldom been so lucidly presented.

The haunting beauty of Copland's work so sensitively written for trumpet and English horn quite captivated the audience. It is certainly one of his most appealing scores. Roger Voisin distinguished himself in the trumpet part.

Schubert's Fourth Symphony and the Franck Symphony completed the Sunday program. Munch was quite in the vein for both, but perhaps the high point in the performance of both was the final allegro of the Schubert. Its exuberance not only dispelled the tragic tinge supposedly coloring the work but quite exhilarated the audience. A brilliant account of the Franck was to be expected.

Claudio Arrau played the Brahms B Flat Piano Concerto on Saturday night. He had performed the D Minor at Lewisohn Stadium earlier in the week. His mastery of the Brahms concertos thus became thoroughly established and clearly discernible.

Boston Symphony Excels In Tanglewood Concert

BY MARJORIE C. TOWER

It seemed, Sunday afternoon at Tanglewood near Lenox, that all Koussevitzky had held most dear was presented through Charles Munch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra to a privileged, huge audience. Exquisitness of sound shimmered through the cavernous, modernistic shed. Intellectual interpretations alive with the artistically perfect degree of emotion marked the outpouring of one of the greatest conductors and his completely dedicated orchestra.

A tremendous ovation with ringing cheers at the close of the concert brought Mr. Munch many times to bow to the enraptured audience. Never did he forget to bring the white-coated instrumentalists to their feet to share with him this just acclaim. However, during the concert, the modest leader ascended the podium or fled from it with scarcely a glance, even when enthusiasm prompted applause after the first great Cesar Franck movement.

Mr. Munch is a squarely-built man, relatively sparing of motion. But when he raises his arms above shoulder level, exhorting the utmost, the heavens really open. He doesn't petition for small effects. One feels that not one gesture is influenced by anything but sincere art. Conducting Barber, Copland, Schubert and Franck without a score, this titan of an individual showed his kinship to ordinary mortals only in the wetness of his grey coat.

To my mind, the famous orchestra plays now with greater beauty than ever before. The nervous tautness which one formerly sensed has been replaced by a willingness to give to the limit of its power. There is luxuriance and peace in the tone quality. But fire can be struck, doubly effective for the greater range of contrast. The string tone was never more opulent, the wood-winds more sweetly pure, nor the brasses more expressive.

Curious Audience

The audience at Tanglewood is the strangest collection of oddly costumed fold executing a musical pilgrimage the writer has witnessed. It always is. Americanized representatives of every nation, in unrestrained holiday attire, rub elbows with Boston's correctly garbed bluebloods and other box-holding elite. Girls in Tyrolean outfits, with deer-skin shorts and braces; men in red-flannel shirts; unabashed, extreme sun-dresses on well-tanned females, a young man with a heavy beard and lumbering-boots, these and other exotic combinations made gay the listeners sprawling on the grass near the Shed. The realization that this harlequin assemblage has motored 100 to 200 miles for this concert, and paid a respectable sum just to sit on the grass, humbles one.

The Program

Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," and Copland's "Quiet City," for trumpet, English horn and strings held the contemporary portion of the porgram. The Barber overture, to my thinking was completely satisfying and successful. Largely gay in mood sinuously twining theme delighted the mind but defied the memory. The "Quiet City" conjured a brooding night-scene with expressive opportunities for trumpet and English horn fully realized. Certain agitated stretches for the strings meant little to this hearer. However, both compositions were valuable examples of today's more pleasing imaginative music.

The music was more richly drawn upon with the Schubert C minor symphony and Cesar Franck's immortal D minor symphony. The former, written by Schubert at 19, shows tremendous promise in the lovely, but overlong slow movement and in the surprising jem of a Minuet. With charming flueney and regard for its gentle melodies, the orchestra revealed this work of the early Romantic period.

It was the Franck symphony which made the tense miles and the heat a small offering in the balance. Over-used words of adulation cannot outline the sublimity of the blended harmonies, the delicately-wrought increases and decreases of shading and acceleration, and the heights of beauty reached. The audience recognized the potency of its musical experience, offering its homage and gratitude to Koussevitzky's successor, Charles Munch.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts at Tanglewood, near Lenox, Massachusetts, will continue through Sunday afternoon, August 12. They will be held on Thursday and Saturday evenings at 8:15 o'clock and on Sunday afternoons at 3 o'clock.

Ovations for Conductor Munch Show His Festival Popularity

By JAY C. ROSENFELD

Charles Munch's reading of the Cesar Franck symphony yesterday afternoon brought the first week end of concerts in the Music Shed at Tanglewood to a rousing close. He went to extremes of tempo and to wide contrasts of dynamics to excite the huge audience to a tremendously tumultuous ovation. He brought the Boston Symphony Orchestra to turbulent climaxes and then by sudden sibilant "shushes" to softer, quieters valleys to make the entire symphony one of great agitation. Anyone who thinks of the Franck symphony as representative of the kindly old composer himself would have to revise his estimate if he were to take yesterday's performance as the standard.

The program had been very intelligently devised. The concert started with two examples of contemporary American composition: Samuel Barber's overture to "The School for Scandal" and Aaron Copland's "Quiet City." Barber's overture calls for a large orchestra. In the near-20 years of its existence it had grown to be accepted as an item in the standard repertory of many orchestras. It has color, impressive thematic material and animation. The orchestra drew forth lovely sounds for Munch in this piece and at the conclusion, the conductor beckoned searchingly for the composer to stand to acknowledge the applause, but Munch seemed to have been misinformed concerning his presence. Copland, however, was there and came forward to shake Munch's hand for the way he conducted the short mood picture "Quiet City." The soloists, Roger Voisin, trumpet and Louis Speyer, English horn, acquitted themselves superbly. Such refined wind-instrument playing is rare indeed.

Schubert's fourth symphony was a refreshing running mate to the American pieces and the French symphony. Again, Munch's choice of tempo injected elan to the music and, in the case of the 19-year-old composer, is probably more defensible. In any case in the proper places it moved along at a speed to the utmost of the virtuoso Bostonians.

Saturday Night Concert

Saturday night's program had been an equally happy sequence. Weber's "Oberon" overture was predictable by the very first sounding of the French horn's solo. The immaculate and round purity of its tone set the pace for the performance of the whole orchestra. Munch tended to exaggerate the pauses and intensify the speedier passages but it all made for drama and effectiveness.

The Prokofieff sixth symphony was a first time for Tanglewood. Much has been written about the concern of the composer's country with the products of its creative artists. This symphony, written since the end of the last war obviously conforms to the ethical dictates of those authorities. To us, it was but a continuation of the music he wrote back in the "Lieutenant Kije" days, facile, glib, witty and extremely talented but without depth. Some things might require re-hearing for fuller consideration but there were few obscurities. At one point it pleases him to require the French horns to swell and subside on a single note 19 times in succession, but in the main his ease of long-line writing is not to be disputed. It is "smart" writing, it is musical epigrams, pleasant and warranting admiration for its workmanship, but little of introspection. It did not seem to inspire the musician in the playing any more than it did us in the listening.

Munch closed Saturday's program with the Brahms second piano concerto with Claudio Arrau as soloist. Mr. Arrau had played the Brahms first at Tanglewood five years ago and it was good to have him back for its counterpart. He confirmed the impression of mastery he made in his previous appearances, playing with conviction and dominating power. His rendition of the formidable task was essentially muscular. He put passion into Brahms's rhythmic patterns and poetry appropriately into the more tenuous lines. An added gem was the beautiful cello solo by Samuel Mayes at the beginning of the slow movement.

Mr. Munch has now run the full gamut of Tanglewood. Although he had completed two full years in Symphony Hall in Boston, he had not conducted here before this season. His three weeks with the smaller ensemble in the theatre-concert hall have now been complemented by the first of the three week ends scheduled for this series. The ovation granted him yesterday afternoon could have left no doubt, if any still remained, concerning his acceptance. A faint smile showed through his usual dignified acknowledgements as the audience insisted on showing him their enthusiastic appreciation.

In Spite of Inefficiencies

TCHAIKOVSKY'S "The Queen of Spades," this season's first offering of the opera department at the Berkshire Music Center, was given on Monday evening before a full house in the theater-concert hall of Tanglewood. Based on Pushkin's famous story of love and gambling and perfidy and the supernatural, and set to passionate and insistent music by Russia's most celebrated composer, this score is one of the finest blueprints in the repertory for producing in the musical theater an abundance of atmosphere and excitement.

Nevertheless, atmosphere, excitement, all the dramatic intensities that seem to inhere in it, are seldom present in its performance. I do not know why this work so seldom makes its effect. Neither can I quite explain how so much of that effect came to life on Monday evening, far more, indeed, than this reviewer has ever formerly experienced. The performance was far from first-class by professional standards. There were musical and dramatic faults without number. And yet the piece made its impression, carried its message to a grateful audience.

The production's first virtue was an English translation that told the story plainly and violated nothing in the vocal line. Its second was the clear enunciation of that text by the singing actors. Its third was sound vocalism on the part of these same actors, particularly those who sang the leading roles—Phyllis Curtin, Eunice Alberts, David Lloyd, Mac Morgan and James Pease. Secondary advantages appeared in the scenery and costume design, which were ambitious and generally successful, if not in any notable way distinguished.

The weakest element of the production was, surprisingly, its musical direction. Boris Goldovsky, who conducted, is an opera leader of considerable experience. And yet his orchestra (students, I admit, but not incompetents, by any means) lacked balance, blending and correctness of pitch. Its tempos lacked vigor, his accompaniments, in many cases, discretion. There must have been more virtue in his work than this reviewer observed, for the performance did have some dramatic power. Its lack of grace on the stage, save in the principle parts (for American vocal students are notoriously sloppy of stance and movement), was neither surprising nor gravely harmful. But nonobservance of the orchestral amenities and general lack of both delicacy and drive in the musical direction might well have failed altogether to animate so complex a score and spectacle.

That no such failure took place must be credited to Mr. Goldovsky, in spite of his orchestral ineptitudes and unsubtle pacing. For the show was his. He had translated it, coached it and staged it in rehearsal, as he conducted it in performance. It did not sound well, except for some of the singing; but it looked well and came over clearly both as music and as drama. This last feat, a difficult one and rarely achieved with "The Queen of Spades," merits note and gratitude. For the opera has dramatic power in it and untold musical wealth. Any one, I should think, would have been glad to make, as this reviewer did on Monday after many years, its real acquaintance.

Toledo Musician Sends Inside Impressions From Tanglewood

By RUTH ELGUTTER

MANY of us have been thrilled to hear the superb music which has been turned out summer after summer at the Berkshire Festival at Lenox, Mass., by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and even by the student groups at Tanglewood. But few have enjoyed the opportunity to view this major American music festival from the inside that has come to one young and talented Toledo musician.

She is Kathleen Henry, who is attending Tanglewood this summer under a scholarship from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During her high school days at DeVilbiss Miss Henry was a pupil of Edwin Lenning of Detroit and before that she studied here with Mitchell Liberman. She was graduated in June from the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester where she studied flute under Joseph Mariano.

Miss Henry is one of seven flutists playing in the Department One Orchestra at Tanglewood and one of two who also play the piccolo. In letters to her parents, Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Henry, Haughton Dr., Miss Henry reports vividly on conductors, compositions and activities in the Massachusetts music center.

"My first opportunity to see Charles Munch in action came with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert July 15," she writes. "He has a marvelously clear beat and, like Toscanini, his tempos really go. Also he is subject to last minute inspiration and may do things quite differently at a concert from the way they were at rehearsal.

"He is a tall, stately man—the minute you see him you know he is SOMEBODY. He and Mr. Leonard Bernstein seem to be great friends.

"On Wednesday, Mr. Bernstein announced at the beginning of rehearsal that the student scheduled to conduct the Debussy Nocturnes had agreed to yield the stick to a 'slightly more experienced student.' After a bit of advice on rehearsal technique from Mr. Burgin, we found ourselves face to face with Charles Munch. After we got over the surprise and the feeling of wondering for an instant which end of our instruments to blow from, he gave a downbeat. Things went well. The orchestra is good—definitely better than last year, I think, but yet it was a bit early in the season to be playing for a man like this.

"Bernstein and Burgin stood around helplessly for a few minutes looking quite worried. Then when it was evident that Munch was getting what he wanted (much to his surprise) I noticed they had a proud and happy look—especially Bernstein.

"It was a rare experience to play under Munch and, as I had played the work at Eastman and hence knew my part, I was able to enjoy it fully. He is no easier to understand in person than over the air. His English is limited and most of his comments during rehearsal came out in a jumble of French and English in practically a whisper. You get the idea without really understanding him.

"He is a vigorous man and loses no time while on the podium. On Friday he had to rehearse us at 9:30 and then go to the theater for a BSO rehearsal at 10. I saw him drive in at about 9:20 in his old and rather battered car — he was really making time going through the grounds. At precisely 9:30 he ran, score in hand, to the podium, put down the score, raised the baton, and we were off. He became so engrossed that he waved aside Bernstein's reminder of the time and kept going until five after 10. Then, seizing the score, he ran off and jumped into his little car and disappeared in a cloud of dust on his way to the theater."

A week later Miss Henry wrote of Bernstein's conducting of Shostakowitch's "Fifth Symphony," in which she played the piccolo.

"Bernstein's approach to the orchestra," she writes, "is that he is very much one of the group—he has a spirit of let's - make - music - together-and-have-fun. But his standards are high and he insists upon their being fulfilled. In the slow movement of this symphony is one of the most difficult passages in symphonic literature.

"Some unwise soul made the mistake of commenting to Bernstein, when the program was planned, that it was quite impossible for the orchestra to play that symphony so early in the season. So Mr. Bernstein, being of the 'nothing is impossible' school of thought, got up and rehearsed us until we COULD play it, third movement included.

At the performance the tension was terrific, both in the orchestra and among those members of the audience who were aware of the situation. The performance, however, far surpassed any of the rehearsals and was a thrilling and gratifying experience. Bernstein was really happy, especially when a faculty member told him later that then, for the first time this year, the orchestra had the 'Koussevitsky flavor,' adding 'There was a quality of sound that would have made him very happy.' The lift which we felt when it was over lasted through the following day."
